Better Justice Association History

Better Justice Association is a politically neutral non-governmental think tank founded to identify the problems of the Turkish judicial system, to design solutions grounded in certain core principles including the rule of law, independent judiciary, transparency and accountability of legal institutions and to raise informed social debate with the aim to reach social consensus on the proposed solutions which is necessary for their sustainable implementation.

Our association was first established with the name Better Justice Movement consisting of willing, determined and socially aware lawyers, academicians and opinion leaders under the leadership of Attorney Mehmet Gün, in order to design applicable solutions to the problems of Turkish judicial system and to raise awareness on the importance of the actualization of the principle of “Full and Frank Disclosure”.

The Movement then acquired the status of association, taking the name Better Justice Association under the will and purpose to enhance the scope of the works planned and to institutionalize, in November 2014.

Publications and Activities of Better Justice Association

Since 2012, Better Justice Association has carried out and supported the studies and activities listed below:

Identifications and Recommendations to Improve the Judiciary System

In August 2012, a statement containing 195 comprehensive articles in 35 pages consisted of specific recommendations for the improvement in the judiciary system was published. This was sent to the Ministry of Justice and higher judicial authorities on the occasion of the opening of the judicial year and was gladly accepted by Ministry of Justice and Presidency of Turkish General National Assembly.

Quality and Aspects of Quality in Judicial Services

The main purpose of this report, which was written by our President Attorney Mehmet Gün during his chairmanship of the Judicial Reform Working Group of TUSIAD (Turkish Industrialists' and Businessmen's Association) after 4 years of work, was to establish and agree on a clear objective for judicial reform. The report was accepted as a TUSIAD document and announced in 2014, endorsed fully by Better Justice Association.

In 2016, the report was shared with the public including leading business representatives via meetings carried out in Samsun, Bursa, Izmir, Mersin and Şanlıurfa, receiving high acceptance.

Full and Frank Disclosure Principle to Change the Understanding of Dispute Resolution

Regarding the dispute resolution and the disclosure of the facts and evidences subject to disputes; with this report, the principle of “Full and Frank Disclosure”, a proposition of a judicial mechanism that provides sincere, complete and correct disclosure and submission of material truth and evidence was proposed. It was advocated to introduce mechanisms and processes to prevent misconduct and complication of the proceedings, and to impose serious sanctions for non-compliance, thus building confidence between claims, defending and court, and providing quality and prompt judicial services.

This creative and innovative solution was proposed to improve the unbalanced distribution of workload throughout the judicial process, to distribute more proportional duties and responsibilities to the parties and their attorneys, and to achieve higher success and raise efficiency with the use of fewer judges in the judiciary system.

In 2017, this proposal was shared with Izmir and Bursa Bar Associations and the public, particularly attorneys and academics. It was presented to the Minister of Justice and the ministry's top bureaucrats and was highly welcomed. It was also shared with the public at a conference held with the Transparency International – Turkey in Istanbul. The activity about the Honesty Rule in Purpose 8 of the released “Judicial Reform Strategy 2019” document was taken from this presentation of our Association.

Opinions and Recommendations on the Expertise Draft Law

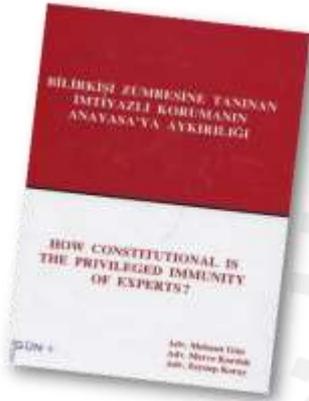

As a result of the intensive work of its members approximately for 3 months, Better Justice Association established a comprehensive opinion report and submitted it to the relevant authorities. The Association has put forward practical suggestions on many issues such as finding and commissioning of experts and supervising of their opinions.

The report, with its compilation of the criticisms, problems of the institution and also recommendations that would help to eliminate the disruptions, delays and complaints on the judiciary system rooting from the institution of expertise did not receive the deserved acceptance.

Our Association insists that the disruptions rooting from the expert evidence regulation, that our Association had warned about even before the the current law was enacted, should be taken into consideration and brought to end and that the judiciary should only keep the records of the experts

How Constitutional is the Privileged Immunity of Experts?

Under the leadership of our President Attorney Mehmet Gun, the study prepared with Intern Attorney Merve Kurdak and Intern Attorney Zeynep Koray under the title “How Constitutional is the Privileged Immunity of Experts?” is a comprehensive and reformist study that questions, criticizes and warns the place of the “Expert” group within the Turkish Judicial System.

The study positions the experts as an institution that responds solely to questions, clarifies technical issues and is fully accountable to the court and the parties.

High Institution of Justice for Judicial Independence

With the proposal of the High Institution of Justice for Judicial Independence, an institutional structure aimed at ensuring accountability in the judiciary is proposed. With this structure, a model will emerge in which all stakeholders will have a say in the judicial superstructure, in which policy formulation and implementation will be separated, in which political considerations will be dampened before being submitted to the operational stage of judicial services, and judicial application paths will be aligned with the decisions of all judicial institutions in accordance with the fundamental provisions of the Constitution.

The proposal was presented to lawyers and civil society representatives in November 2017 within the scope of Turkish Economic and Social Studies Foundation (TESEV) Democratization Discussions, and a joint workshop was held with TESEV and the proposal was welcomed by the public opinion.

Turkey's Middle Democracy Issues; Judiciary, Accountability, Fair Representation, and The Way to Solve Them

"Turkey's Middle Democracy Issues, Judiciary, Accountability, Fair Representation and The Way to Solve Them", which was published in May 2018, revealed the need of Turkey having more democratic institutions. The "inured" problems of Turkey which cause the country to be called having a "mid-level of democracy" and their root causes were considered in the book, and solutions were recommended from a legal perspective, and a comprehensive reform recommendation was presented.

Recommendations were made through three main channels: (i) A better "Judiciary" (ii) "Accountability" in all institutions, particularly in the judiciary (iii) "Justice in Representation" for all institutions with electoral mechanisms.

Turkey's Dilemma: Middle Income Trap and Mid-Level Democracy

The executive summary of the book titled " Turkey's Middle Democracy Issues, Judiciary, Accountability, Fair Representation and The Way to Solve Them" was formed as a policy recommendation, separated from the book. This policy recommendation was also adopted by our close stakeholder Turkish Enterprise and Business Confederation (TURKONFED). With this policy recommendation, paths for Turkey to break out of middle path of democracy were suggested.

The policy recommendation was shared with leading business representatives, academics and opinion leaders at meetings held in 10 cities between 2017-2019.

Preface

Please find, below, the assessments, comments and suggestions of Daha İyi Yargı Derneđi (Better Justice Association) concerning the “Judicial Reform Strategy 2019” document, addressed to the public on May 30, 2019, by President Recep Tayyip Erdođan.

The reforms intended for the further development of businesses and organisations can attain the desired goals only if consensus is reached by the public concerning the direction, goals, and methods of the reform. However, to reach a public consensus on vital and critical issues is rather difficult and will take time.

Judicial reform is a very complicated and complex issue through which it is rather difficult to reach public consensus. Public consensus may not be reached on a certain document, but the thinkers who structure debates on a specific document may, in fact, read when a consensus has occurred and demonstrate it to the public. A clash of ideas results in improvement and development by the opposing parties. Although improvements may be achieved in a short period time through wisdom and good communication, absent of these essential tools debates on public issues can take years to come to fruition for the public. For this reason, nations develop at speeds different from each other, and some of them, even though they are also developing, remain behind other nations.

To ensure that our country scores a faster pace of development and improvement in our judicial system, our Association seeks to exhibit a positive and constructive approach in the assessment and criticism of the Judicial Reform Strategy 2019 document, and to furnish constructive suggestions of the gaps detected therein. We seek not to refrain from expressing criticisms and opposition, but also not to use any injurious or harmful words, or insinuations, while expressing comments and suggestions. We also believe that all criticisms of the 2019 Strategy should be honoured, and that the positive and constructive aspects therein should be acknowledged and taken into consideration.

Executive Summary

President Recep Tayyip Erdoğan shared the “Judicial Reform Strategy 2019”, which updates the previous 2009 and 2015 strategies, with the public on 30 May 2019, thus showing that this strategy has been accepted and committed at the highest level of executive power.

To honour non-derogatory criticisms and constructive suggestions is the key to establish a consensus and achieve success in our judicial reform, which is urgently needed.

The “Judicial Reform Strategy 2019” was prepared in tandem with the basic objective of becoming an EU member state, same as the 2009 and 2015 strategies. It states and stresses very accurately that “It has relied upon some certain social demands,” and “Has arisen from the background of social demands.” Judicial reform is not a formality required to be fulfilled in order to be accepted into the EU, but is an urgent and vital need of society in practice; however, as it was made public on May 30th, it created an impression of being in response to the EU progress report that was made public the day prior to its release, i.e. on 29 May 2019.

Appreciated aspects of the “Judicial Reform Strategy 2019” is that a wider stakeholder population has been included in its scope in comparison to the previous versions, and that intensive efforts have been expended in order to determine and set down the demands and concerns of the citizens.

Within a rather short period of time of approximately one year, starting from the Justice Council convened on 1 October 2018, and ending on 30 May 2019, when the strategy was made public, the self-sacrificing efforts of the officials from the Ministry of Justice who organised and held many workshops, conferences, meetings and negotiations that required fairly heavy planning and coordination efforts and have resulted in this document are, alone, independently and separately from the document itself indeed worthy of commendation.

The most important statement made in the strategy highlights the close relationship between the rule of law and the economy, stating that an efficient legal system will further improve the investment environment as well. This statement is, however, inadequate. The rule of law and economy are not separate disciplines, because one can liken the rule of law to the nerves and veins of the economy; as the law functions more fluidly in a country, the higher the economic successes that will be realised.

On the Methodology

Firstly, whereas it is required to design and define the “target state” to be achieved, and to determine the “current state” and to describe how the gap between the two will be closed, the “Judicial Reform Strategy 2019” has suffered from the lack of scientific methodology, same as the previous 2009 and 2015 strategies, most probably because it is an update of the previous strategy documents. However, scientific methodology plays a critical and vital role by securing some critical success factors, such as determination of a problem and its root cause, and identification and inclusion of all stakeholders, preventing lack of plan, and the probable failures thereof.

On the Stakeholders and Inclusion

It is good to note that a wide range of stakeholder has actually been identified during the preparation of the “Judicial Reform Strategy 2019”, but it is unsure whether the relevant stakeholders are sufficiently included. Because despite the Better Justice Association has declared it is ready and willing to work voluntarily, it has not even been invited to the meeting that was held with the 30 non-governmental organisations working in the field of law.

In this respect it is worth mentioning that, the 35 page report covering a total of 195 determinations and suggestions and, as declared by our Association’s founders in August of 2012, is rich enough to be the basis for a comprehensive judicial reform. Better Justice Association’s proposal named Full and Frank Disclosure, is probably the most critical proposal for our legal system, has been adopted in Target 8.2(a); and its proposal to form a “Supreme Justice Board” has been generally accepted by the public.

Furthermore, Mehmet Gün, the Chairman of the Association, with contributions by the Association members, authored the widely acknowledged book “Turkey’s Middle Democracy Issues and the Solution: Judiciary, Accountability and Justice in Representation,” addresses the various structural problems of the Turkish judiciary, along with analysis of root causes thereof and, offers comprehensive reforms proposals including evolution and transformation of organisations, as well as reforms to the existing procedures and processes

Participation of only the supporters of a single opinion, or by only one interest group is by no means adequate for the success in the creation of a strategy but, to the contrary, it guarantees failure therein.

On Determination and Analysis of Problems, and Diagnosis of Root Causes

The determination of complaints, the formulation of suggestions for solutions, and the making of plans for their resolution are neither adequate nor healthy in order to address underlying problems. For a real solution, the existing problems should be determined very precisely, and the root causes thereof should be thoroughly investigated.

For example, while each person or entity is endeavouring to increase the volume of its works, why does the Judiciary complain about a heavy workload, and what are the underlying problems and the root causes thereof? The “heavy workload” problem can never be resolved unless the above questions are answered accurately, but to the contrary, such methodologies are adopted that actually lead to the denial of the raison d’être (reason for being) of the Judiciary, and the problems are avoided. As observed in the said document, the functions of the Judiciary are transferred to various alternative organisations and to executive power and administrations; thus, leaving aside any resolution, the problems become even more complicated than before.

Many problems, such as the heavy workload of the judiciary, loss of prestige and reputability of legal professions, and unemployment of lawyers despite there are less lawyers per capita compared to developed countries, and degeneration of society as a whole are, in fact, rooted in the severe failures in the implementation of the honesty rule set down in Article 29 of the Civil Procedures Code, as formulated in Objective 8, which has been adopted from the presentation of the Better Justice Association, as we learned with great pleasure.

However, and despite this fact, the strategy document, lacking root cause analysis of problems, has not yet fully established the relationship between the existing complaints and these problems.

The same picture is valid also for the dream of concluding lawsuits “in a single court hearing,” as detailed in Objective 4, Objective 7 and Target 4.8. The root cause of these problems is a single and common failure: “Failure in the implementation of the honesty rule in trials!”

So long as the parties and their counsel are encouraged and ensured to fully, accurately, and frankly disclose any and all material facts and evidence concerning the subject of dispute, all of the problems mentioned hereinabove will automatically have been eliminated, and it will be possible to hear and conclude lawsuits in a single court hearing, to try and adjudicate on the disputes as deserved.

The deeper the problem is further analysed, it will be observed that while it is considered as an offence of perjury to the court in United Kingdom, and in many other countries, our scholars have legitimised lying to the court in our country as a defence right and this, in turn, has led to the aforementioned problems. As a result, civil proceedings fail to establish the material facts, and the citizens and their counsel have become talented in twisting the truth and in inventing perfect lies to tell the court. This, in turn, deteriorates and degenerates the society while causing the Turkish courts becoming deprived of modern trial techniques.

How may the act of lying to the court be admitted as a right of defence in Turkey? Whereas the perjury offence is not considered as a violation human rights in the United Kingdom, how could the same rules be perceived as a violation of human rights in Turkey, and for which reasons?

Likewise, the “weird” concept of “prohibition of amendment of claim and defence” that is a gross mutation of the prohibition of amending the nature of lawsuit into a “freak” mechanism has, in practice, turned ineffective the trial processes and procedures in the Turkish courts transforming the trials into “wild west” like performances.

A Brief Assessment on Objectives and Activities:

Objective 1: Protection and Development of Rights and Freedoms

For the sake of the survival of our state, and for the peace and security of our society it is everybody's sincere wish terrorism and terrorist organisations are fought effectively, and resolutely.

However, the fight against terrorism does not justify unjust, unfair, and unreasonable restrictions on the rights and freedoms of innocent people. Judicial authorities, through their rulings and verdicts, draw the sensitive and fine line between these two sides.

On the other hand, the sentence of "The document should at the same time be read and interpreted as a guide for law enforcers and practitioners," in Article 9, on Page 7 may, as well, be easily perceived as if this document is issuing instruction or order to the independent and impartial judicial authorities.

The awareness training and performance scoring said to be implemented in the future will, alone, be insufficient to prevent the breaches of rights caused by the judiciary.

Appeals against the decisions of criminal judges of peace should be decided, not by another criminal judge of peace, but by more senior and specialised courts, and the responsibility in this respect should not be limited to a group of criminal judges of peace, but distributed to the entire judicial community. This action will help to eliminate the negative prejudices that the public holds against the criminal judges of peace.

The modus operandi by the public prosecutors regarding their exercise of powers should be regulated to the fullest extent, and all of their actions and decisions that may limit or restrict the rights and freedoms of people, even to the slightest degree, should be made subject to a decision of the courts that should be established and authorised specifically for this purpose. A public prosecutor should be assigned to each police station and, thus, individual rights and freedoms should receive maximum protection.

Objective 2: Improving Independence, Impartiality and Transparency of the Judiciary

Firstly, we would like to state that the executive power's desire to rehabilitate the judiciary, which should indeed be capable of auditing and balancing itself, and be fully independent for the sake of rule of law, is self-contradictory and strange.

As a result of this self-contradiction, the document does not address the criticism against the election of members of the Council of Judges and Prosecutors by the Executive, nor against the non-functionality of the Council of Judges and Prosecutors without the Ministry of Justice and his Undersecretary which is, in fact, considered a "backward movement" in the EU Progress Report and, but, the document defends the existing problematic structure. Our Association is strongly against this view and the stance of the document.

The document states that judicial power also establishes and maintains balance among powers in the system of separation of powers, and stresses the importance of the principle of separation of powers strengthened [by transition to the Presidential Executive system], and adds that the constitutional function of the judiciary is vital for a strong and complete democracy. However, the document fails to explain how a balance should be established between the National Assembly and the President, and what the roles and functions of the judiciary are to be in relation therewith, nor does it make reference to the Objectives or activities of the judiciary as to protection of the rule (supremacy) of law against the President or other public servants and officers.

By stating, "There are many fundamental instruments that can be employed for assuring the independence of the judiciary. All of these instruments indeed serve the aim to strengthen judges and prosecutors," and, "Targets are formulated for professional strengthening of judges and prosecutors." the strategy entirely leaves the most important aspect of the independence of the judiciary, i.e. "the judiciary's inability to function independently," thus seeing the independence of the judiciary only as a matter of the strengthening of judges and prosecutors independence, thereby promising only very limited progress.

As it can be easily observed the strategy is not built on a healthy idea of "independence of the judiciary."

By stating that a right of opposition will be recognised to some disciplinary decisions of the Council of Judges and Prosecutors, the strategy does not acknowledge, as an adverse historical development, the “closure of judicial review and auditing channels to the decisions of the Council of Judges and Prosecutors” which was, indeed, cancelled by the Constitutional Court in 1977, “due to being in contradiction with the republican state, rule of law and equality before the principles of law,” but has since been re-introduced by the military junta into law, in 1981, and into Constitution, in 1982.

The suggested action as to granting geographical security “to some judges” as cited in Target 2.1(a) will not be meaningful, and will not provide an institutional assurance, unless judicial remedies are provided against the appointment decisions of the Council of Judges and Prosecutors.

Amongst the activities listed in Target 2.1, it states that the interviews organised to accept candidates into the profession of judges and prosecutors will be held by a committee based on a wide foundation of representation. However, the public is complaining not about the interview itself, but about the manner in which it is conducted, and the process chosen.

The reason is that interviews and the resulting decisions do not meet and satisfy the transparency and accountability criteria that are the fundamental conditions of democratic governance.

Where the judiciary is not transparent and accountable, and where there are no judicial reviews or legal remedies against the decisions made by the Council of Judges and Prosecutors concerning judicial organs or components, or the decisions made by judicial organs concerning their own colleagues, i.e. judicial review is not available in any respect, discussion of ethics in the judiciary will not be convincing. For instance, is it not odd that the Court of Cassation purports transparency and accountability on the one hand, while it keeps in strict confidence the reports of its investigating judges relying upon its own internal regulations that itself has no legal basis.

Objective 3: Improving the Quality and Quantity of Human Resources

Firstly, we would like to emphasise that it is impossible to improve and enhance the qualities of human resources without enhancing the overall quality level in trials - in other words, the quality judicial services and processes. Qualified human resources may be acquired only for and through high quality job functions.

It should be observed that in the absence of effective and productive works, quantitative increase in human resources will augment the chaos and complications, weigh down efficiency and productivity, and aggravate the problems.

Given the fact that we are suffering from “brain drain” (our young brains being drawn to foreign countries solely due to entry exams), Turkey needs to establish, and as soon as possible, a new system in which the education by its educational institutions, exams they organise, and the results of such exams are accredited and honoured without hesitation.

In law-based professions, before the initiation of exams, career plans should be laid out, and if exams are organised in any event, they should be available to everyone and at every stage. Just like judges and prosecutors, also for attorneys and counsel, a comprehensive career plan that also provides vocational retraining, should be prepared and put into practice so as to encourage transfer of knowledge and experience from seniors to young colleagues, and to speed up and institutionalise professional and vocational development.

Objective 4: Improving Performance and Productivity

To have the judges find, assign, appoint and monitor the experts, and to treat the experts, all being private persons, as if they are unofficial judges, and to bring them almost to the position of assistant judges, thereby granting protection to them, indeed constitutes a flagrant and unfair intervention with the rights of allegation, claims and defences of both sides at trial.

Court appointed experts have, over time, morphed into a rather degenerated institution. To institutionalise it even more firmly in the process of time, and to adopt and back this degenerated mechanism, both institutionally and administratively, indeed injects into the judicial system the degeneration, deterioration and corruptness of the expertise mechanism.

The root cause of this expertise problem is the manner in which the experts are used. It is the right and the duty of both sides and their counsel to obtain expert opinions, and the courts should never interfere with this, but should only allow the discussion of expert opinions in court hearings.

It is, in fact, possible to resolve disputes and conclude lawsuits that are currently taking 4 or 5 years on average in the courts in only 50 to 100 days, on average, in a single court hearing, and at a reasonable cost and, thus, to allow both sides to use their time in more constructive and more efficient manner, rather than wasting their time by unnecessarily going to the courthouse 15 times, on average, as is done at the present time.

The UYAP has brought a lot of innovations and conveniences to the judiciary but, nevertheless, given that the data processing and informatics systems have developed so much, the UYAP's achievements are too little in comparison to what it should have achieved so far, and what should be expected from a good data processing and informatics system.

The UYAP (National Judiciary Informatics System) should not be used as a means of saving the judges from humanistic accountability situations by facing both sides and their counsel in the courts.

Development of new applications and software programs satisfying the needs of tens of thousands of users, and integration thereof with the UYAP should be facilitated and encouraged.

The UYAP should already be contributing to and directly participating in the creation of an artificial intelligence in the field of law in our country. It should also participate in the generation of solutions for the performance of existing job duties and functions in a more effective and efficient manner.

Objective 5: Ensuring the Effective Use of Right of Defense

It should be stated upfront that lawyers who are indisputably and unequivocally public servants should be granted not only a green passport, but all of their rights, and all of the status, powers, and privileges required for the performance of their profession, should be granted to them.

As properly and correctly stated in the strategy, it should be ensured that decisions of lack of jurisdiction, and decisions of rejection of venue (foreign pleas), are resolved without any delay in trials. If the citizens cannot, or do not exactly know to which court they should go, the government is responsible for this, and the government should take action to ensure that its citizens can easily and smoothly find the correct courts so that their lawsuits are commenced and heard as soon as possible.

Objective 7: Improving the Effectiveness of the Criminal Justice System

Our Association opposes the actions suggested in Target 7.1 formulated under the heading of “Both pre-prosecution remedies and means of resolution and investigation processes will be strengthened,” because of the reasons explained briefly, below:

- a) Contrary to the suggested actions, the discretionary powers of public prosecutors should not be expanded, but their decisions to charge, or to cease investigation, should be made subject to the audit and decision of the courts of evidence and inquiry.
- b) “Return of indictment” mechanism should be transformed into and be replaced by “approval of indictment” mechanism. A specialised court should be created to approve the prosecutor’s charges, which may lead to criminal proceedings, or decisions of non-prosecution, as well as auditing and monitoring the evidence collection and inquiry stages, and to ensure that lawsuits are ready to be heard, tried and concluded in a single court hearing.

To this end, the existing Criminal Courts of Peace should be transformed and the powers transferred to public prosecutors during those years should be returned to these courts and, thus, the courts of evidence and inquiry that had been removed in 1980s should be re-established in a more developed structure.

Instead of rules suggested in Targets 7.1(f) and (g), which will inevitably create a new, additional and more complicated bureaucracy, the public prosecutors and judicial police should be turned into an integrated service unit and, other than the attorneys representing the prosecution in court hearings, those prosecutors should be assigned to the sites of the security forces, and be appointed as the superiors of the security forces in judicial matters.

Objective 8: Simplification and Increasing the Efficiency of Civil Justice and Administrative Procedure

First of all the process and operations designs specified by the Civil Procedures Code for civil law trials and proceedings contain very critical errors, and are not fit and consistent with the nature, requirements and realities of dispute resolution activities.

The law drives both sides through an adventure ride, with risks of unpredictable results, rather than correctly putting forth their rights before the courts and taking the correct legal actions.

The preliminary examination institution should be annulled as soon as possible, and be redesigned as “the preliminary issues hearing,” and be used only to quickly decide on jurisdictional and statutory limitation issues, or any other such exception that require immediate suspension and stoppage of court trials and hearings, and be concluded with a final decision or verdict thereon.

The archaic evidence production and collection order should be abandoned, which was available also in the Civil Law Procedures Code and is maintained in the Civil Procedures Code, and replaced by contemporary and modern processes.

“The prohibition on amendment of claims and defense” which is a dominant theory in the Civil Procedures Code, and has almost ossified today as a result of a simple theoretical mistake made in the 1950s, should be seriously reviewed and annulled, and it should be specified that only the nature or kind of a lawsuit cannot be changed. Therefore, to expand on material facts brought to and claimed in the court should be free and, likewise, the monetary value of the subject matter of the lawsuit should also be freely increased or reduced, if needed.

The problem of court duties, mentioned in Target 8.1(e), leads to increase the workload of the judicial system, and to procedural chaos, as well as unnecessary generation of new types of lawsuits and legal actions.

Almost all of the entirely unnecessary matters under discussion, such as “partial actions of debt and determination,” and “whether or not a declaratory action alone can be pursued,” and “an action of indefinite debt,” which have been brought by Article 107 of the Civil Procedures Code, that entraps the 100% righteous parties, have divided even the most distinguished jurists busying them with trivial matters, have all arisen because of inaccurate provisions pertaining to judicial fees and duties.

The law provisions on judicial duties consider the duties as a means of earning income for the national treasury, while solely due to fiscal officers’ arguments for “revenues for the treasury” the state is unfairly intervening in the rights of citizens, without any justification.

The state cannot act like a mafia organisation, and should not charge a court fee at a certain rate concerning the rights of its citizens being the subject matter of a dispute. Court fees should be either symbolic or fixed.

Failure to pay court fees should not preclude the court from hearing and trying cases. Court fees are brutal for some types of lawsuits. For instance, it is not logical or reasonable to charge court fees and travel allowances on family law suits and transactions. To the contrary, it can be compared with parasite feeding by the state at the expense of its citizens.

In multilateral lawsuits, particularly in thousands of consumer rights lawsuits that are very similar or identical to the other, the state should give up its existing approach of protecting itself and neglecting its citizens. Group lawsuits should also be allowed in the Civil Procedures Code, and a class action lawsuit procedure that instantly resolves thousands of identical disputes or claims arising out of the same material cause, such as subscription and product liability for objects of litigation in financially meaningless amounts, which do not even equal to the cost of notification, should be allowed and, briefly, the “summary judgment” procedure should also be adopted and applied in Turkey.

Turkey lags behind in “disputes arising out of family law,” as cited in Target 8.3. This should be given priority in the action plan, and the steps aimed at strengthening the family system should be taken as soon as possible.

Court fees and expenses should not be charged on lawsuits and proceedings regarding family law, and a significant part of the attorney fees charged therein should be paid or reimbursed by the state.

Child support and supplementary welfare alimony decisions should not be based on the judge’s personal life perceptions, or on the investigations performed by the security forces upon the instruction of the judge, but should be made decisively, and at the highest degree of accuracy according to the declarations of financial status which pave the way for serious legal sanctions if untrue, and are required to be confirmed and verified by relevant documentary evidence, save for exceptions, and are required to be quickly completed and submitted to the court, and are to be certified to be true, under seal.

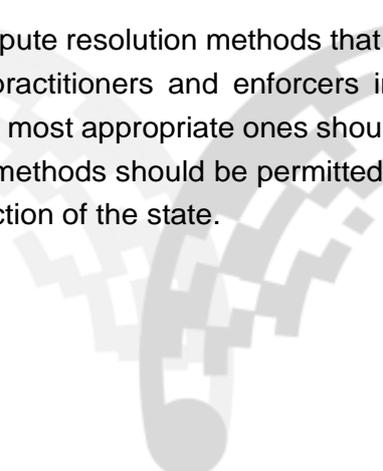

Just like the example of supplementary welfare alimony decisions, although the economic and financial status of both sides should be reviewed at regular intervals, and these decisions should be removed at some time in the future, if and when needed. They are currently given permanently, and this, in turn, leads to great harm committed through the courts, and even causes imprisonment of some innocent subjects who can no longer afford to pay alimony to the other side.

When such alimony decisions are made, the sides should not be obliged to convince the judge concerning a change in their financial situation causing harm to them but, to the contrary, the relevant judge should be obliged to regularly review whether the alimony decision has led to an error in disfavour of either side and, if so, to revise and change his decision even without any claim.

“Delivery of child and maintenance of personal relations with child,” as stated in Target 8.3(b) should no more be a duty of execution offices, and both sides should be encouraged and required to take these steps by themselves, without any intervention of juridical authorities.

Objective 9: Spreading Alternative Dispute Resolution Methods

Some different dispute resolution methods that are very familiar to, and can be easily applied by, law practitioners and enforcers in a developed law system, should be identified, and the most appropriate ones should be selected from amongst them, but these alternative methods should be permitted to become an alternative of jurisdictional power and function of the state.

Introduction and General Evaluation

Even though Article 24 in Introduction states "the need for reform is mainly based on social demands" and Article 24 states "the will for reform rises on the basis of the system's needs and social demands, beyond political objectives related to the EU accession process" and although in the Introduction part, the main perspectives of "Rights and Freedoms", "European Union" and "Operation of the Justice System" are given, it is understood that the "European Union Perspective" is the basis for the preparation of the Strategy Document. As such, Target 4.14(e) states: "Action plans will be drawn up upon evaluating the European Commission's [...] -year progress reports."

Strategy Documents for 2009 and 2015, which were substantially updated by JRS 2019, were also prepared with the main purpose of becoming a member to the European Union. Besides, the reform is already about the "Operation of the Justice System". "Rights and Freedoms" would actually be the subject of the law reform, not the judicial reform, except in the case of violations caused by the judiciary, which are part of the heading Operation of the System.

The "Judicial Reform Strategy 2019" document, which was announced on 30 May 2019 right after the announcement of the EU Progress Report on 29 May 2019, was a response to the EU Progress Report from the highest level, the President.

However, at this stage, it is still unclear if the Strategy Document, whose action plan has not been declared yet, is adequate to eliminate the criticisms set out in the EU Progress Report or to provide a real reform. Because:

- a) First of all, it should be stated that the action plans which, in the Strategy Document, are indicated to be prepared in the future are not yet clear. Therefore, it is not clear to what extent, how and when the commitments in the Document are going to be fulfilled. In the absence of a clear goal in the Strategy Document, it is difficult to predict what the action plan will achieve.

- b) The Strategy Document does not propose a change about the fact that the members of the CJP (The Council of Judges and Prosecutors) are directly and indirectly elected by the executive and that the CJP cannot function without the members of the executive, namely the Minister of Justice and the Undersecretary of Justice, which is a situation that is seriously criticized and considered as “retrogression” by the Progress Report; and on the contrary, it glorifies the current problematic situation.

The document "Judicial Reform Strategy 2019" is the third document declared on judicial reform in Turkey, preceded by the first judicial reform strategy document prepared in 2009 and the second one declared in 2015.

Having the will of judicial reform in this regard, which society considers to be the first priority, presented as a serious commitment at the presidential level is pleasing.

As stated in Article 4 of Introduction, starting on page 5 of the Strategy Document, judicial reform is a vital need as clearly expressed by the society that has a thirst for justice and quality judicial services, and is required to be performed urgently. Therefore, the public will assess this document to see (i) whether or not the needs of the society have been correctly determined; (ii) whether the long-term goal (vision) is appropriate to fulfill this need; (iii) whether the objectives are sufficient and appropriate to meet the needs of the society and the vision in the Document; and will express, including but not limited to these, their positive or negative responses.

JRS 2019 Document sets forth the long-term objective (vision) of Turkish jurisdiction for 2023 as “An Assuring and Accessible Justice System”. In order to achieve this vision, the 7 different aspects below have been stated under “Principles and Values” :

- (i) Increasing confidence in the judiciary;
- (ii) Improving judicial independence and impartiality;
- (iii) Facilitating access to justice;
- (iv) Improving the concept of people-oriented services;
- (v) Protecting and promoting the rights and freedoms more effectively;
- (vi) Strengthening legal security and
- (vii) Observing the right for trial within a reasonable time

Listed in the order of importance attached by our Association, we do not find it right to call these 7 aspects as “Principles and Values” . Because in our opinion, these are not “values” or “principles” and can only be considered as “objectives”.

Indeed, these 7 aspects can be considered as sub-headings/objectives that need to be addressed to achieve the vision for 2023.

However, 9 main Objectives and various numbers of targets set out in ‘Goals and Targets’ do not completely match up to these 7 aspects.

On pages 96 to 98 of JRS 2019, the activities carried out during preparation of the Document are listed under 38 headings in total. It is understood that a study process under high pressure has been performed and interviews, surveys, workshops and conferences were held with domestic and foreign stakeholders starting on 10 August 2018 to 30 May 2019, when the document was declared publicly.

Contrary to expectations, it was preferred to list the activities instead of sorting them out in a chronological order. As stated in the 1st line on page 96, in fact, it is possible to start the preparation process for the document with the Council of Justice held on 10 January 2018.

Indeed, on said pages 96 to 98, it is stated that opinions and assessments obtained during workshops, conferences, meetings and similar events held with the European Council, European Court of Human Rights, EU Commission in the international area; governmental agencies such as the Justice Commission of the Grand National Assembly of Turkey, Supreme Court and Council of State, CJP (Council of Judges and Prosecutors), Presidency, Board of Law Policies, Ombudsman, Union of Turkish Bar Associations, Law Faculties, General Directorate of Security; additionally, representatives of the business world, in particular TOBB, MÜSİAD and TÜSİAD; and “approximately 30 representatives from various law associations”; as well as survey results from “Social Demand Survey” conducted face-to-face in the cities mentioned in line 24; and opinions and recommendations of 66 people in total, comprising of journalists, writers and academicians, were included when drawing up the JRS 2019 document.

When the intensity of planning, coordination and execution requirements for each of these studies is considered, it is necessary to be aware of and appreciate the efforts of the selfless bureaucrats of the Ministry of Justice, who have created the Document by carrying out this work in a relatively short period of time, which is approximately a year, and whose names were not even mentioned in the Document.

These explanations indicate that a broader group of stakeholders was included in the preparation of the Document compared to the previous ones; that not only the judicial organs and elements that provide the judicial services but also the business world that receives the service, the relevant professional interest groups and the public opinion, which is the final receiver of the service, were tried to be included. The involvement of bars and the Turkish Bar Association, whose participation in previous strategy studies was limited, and the fact that their opinions were taken into consideration should be noted as important positive developments.

Issue of Methodology in Preparation of JRS 2019

In Article 5 of the Introduction in the Strategy Document, the following statement exists: “Reform documents can only be prepared by analyzing different factors that directly or indirectly affect the area. Assessment of need for this JRS is based on a broad status analysis from a systematic and holistic perspective.”, but the methodology of the activity described here is not explained.

To explain roughly, strategy is a plan about how and by which way the “target state”, which is intended to be achieved from the “current state” shall be attained. Therefore, the strategy document should include at least one “current state” determination, one “target state” determination intended to be reached, and a plan explaining how the gap between these two states will be closed (also the details about what will be done by whom, when and where).

For the strategy to be accepted and for the expected goal to be reached, in other words, for the strategy to succeed, all relevant stakeholders must be mapped and it must be ensured that such stakeholders agree on the “current state” and the “target state” as well as on the plan. To monitor how successful the activities are in achieving the strategy, and also to act as an indicator of determination to reach the intended situation, it is obligatory that the strategy indicates what the outputs will be, how they will be monitored, measured and reported, and how they will be updated. The facts that the JRS 2019 document is an update of the 2009 and 2015 Strategy Documents and that most of the strategic goal headings in these three documents are the same or similar to one another show the importance of “monitoring, measuring, assessing and updating” for the strategy.

As was the case with the previous Strategy Documents for 2009 and 2015, it is not clear what type of methodology was followed, or what preferences were adopted for what reason for the preparation of the JRS 2019 document.

From the statements in Articles 1 and 2 of the “Introduction” section of the Document, it is understood that although “significant developments” have been made, the need for “rationale-oriented” reform continues and therefore, the JRS 2019 Document was prepared by updating the previous - 2009 and 2015 - strategy documents. As such, the statements on the progress made in the “Second [2015] JRS Period” of Articles 36 to 66 on pages 12 to 16 confirm that the JRS 2019 Document is an update of the document in 2015 and the previous ones.

Still, it is not possible to deduce the methodology used to prepare the Document by looking at these. Because the strategy documents in 2009 and 2015 did not reveal a clear methodology, either. The lack of methodology caused the 2015 Strategy Document to be considered a “general plan” in the 2015 EU Progress Report. It is seen that when preparing the JRS 2019 Document, a certain methodology was not followed, as was the case in the previous documents. The 2019 document, which is an update to the previous documents, is therefore considered to have been the victim of the lack of methodology as in the previous strategy documents.

During the formation of a strategy document, existence of a healthy, fully efficacious scientific methodology serves vital and critical objectives such as the identification of the problem and the root cause, identification and inclusion of all the stakeholders related to and affected by the problem, as well as ensuring focus in discussions and efficiency in the process. Lack of methodology may lead to disruptions throughout the entire process, including planlessness and uncertainty. For example, although the “prominent main topics” mentioned in Article 6 in Introduction are topics that are related to judicial reform and must be mentioned in the Strategy document, these might not be enough to reach the intended final goal unless a scientific methodology is followed and said topics are related to a plan.

In addition, failure to follow a scientific methodology may cause the resulting strategy to be disapproved, ignored, or rejected without being reviewed at all, no matter how well-intentioned it is and how much effort is made. Under these circumstances, if the strategy, which is not accepted or adopted by the public, is implemented by those who have prepared it, this might be considered as imposition and cause other problems. The lack of a scientific methodology in the JRS 2019 document may lead to these concerns.

Descriptions under the heading “Main Perspective Regarding Rights and Freedoms” on page 7-8 in Introduction; “The European Union Perspective” on page 9 ; and “Main Perspective on the Operation of the Justice System” on page 10-11 are the matters followed by people from all regions of Turkey sensitively and to be agreed on easily to determine a shared final goal.

However, to ensure that the proposals made can be deepened and accepted, it is critical to identify and include all stakeholders, get their opinions and agree with them. Otherwise, even the right discourse may not be accepted, well-intentioned studies may lead to doubts, and sincerity may be questioned. For example, it can be thought that what is said about fundamental rights and freedoms is not meant for the needs of the society, but for the purpose of opening a door to the membership to the EU.

Judicial Reform methodology should be prepared with the participation and contribution of specialized and experienced industrial engineers, and it should be noted that the judiciary is a service comprising tens of thousands of people, which provides services throughout the country and whose procedures of rendering services are subject to universal and local principles and standards. Conformity of the design to be created by engineers to the basic legal principles and standards should be confirmed by jurist stakeholders and agreed with internal, external, local and international stakeholders.

Better Justice Association believes that Judicial Reform Strategy Formulation Methodology can be outlined as follows in light of the interviews made with strategy experts and its members experienced in strategy formulation. The outline structure should be put into a comprehensive scientific framework by evaluating the data related to the problem intended to be solved together with the experts of the subject.

1. Country's goal (determination and explanation of goals shortly, such as long term: 2023 or 2071; medium term: 2030 or 2040; and short term: 2023.)
2. The role and responsibility of the judiciary in achieving the country's objective (setting forth as long, medium and short term objectives to be sufficient to determine the long-term objective.)
3. Determining on which issue and why the judiciary will reform and its ultimate aim
4. Mapping and grading the stakeholders
 - a) 1st Group: Service providers
 - b) 2nd Group: Receivers of the service
 - c) Organizers
 - d) Opinion leaders
5. Main topics to achieve the ultimate goal of the judiciary
 - a) main topic 1: for example: Structural Issues
 - b) main topic 2: for example: Human Resources Issues

- c) main topic 3: for example: Service Procedures and Processes
 - d) main topic 4: for example: Production, Outputs, Services
 - e) main topic 5: For example: Financing and Financial Issues
 - f) main topic 6: etc.
6. Mutual agreement on the long-term goal in compliance with the responsibility of the judiciary
 7. Current state; identification of problems and opportunities; root cause analysis
 8. Designing and agreeing on a formal - final goal in conformity with the objectives
 9. The elements to achieve the intended final goal:
 - a) Structural Issues
 - b) Human resources and management elements
 - c) Applicable or new procedures and processes
 - d) Production and outputs
 - e) etc.
 10. Determining the method - strategy for achieving the objective
 11. Determining the intermediate goals and actions to be taken
 12. An action plan that is responsible, suitable for the identified terms and ensures accountability
 13. Monitoring, measurement, evaluation and updates.

Inclusiveness, Stakeholder Map and Rating

It is gratifying that a much wider stakeholder circle was reached compared to the documents in 2009 and 2015, and their views were compiled when creating the JRS 2019. For example, the fact that lawyers were involved through bar associations; observations and complaints of the receivers of the service were listened to via an opinion survey; and the drafts were discussed in circles with broader participation indicates progress compared to the previous documents.

Inclusion of all stakeholders without discrimination is essential for both the determination of the current state in a healthy manner and designing the objective intended to be achieved in a more accurate and realizable way, and in order to achieve this objective, it is essential to ensure that the stakeholders accept it and feel responsible for it from the very beginning. All of these are critical factors for the strategy to be successful in achieving the objective.

However, it is doubtful that the document covers stakeholders in such a way that every relevant person and entity can participate in the activities.

For example, although it was stated that meetings were held with 30 non-governmental organizations in the field of law, our Better Justice Association was not contacted during the preparation of the Strategy Document or during the mentioned NGOs meeting.

Better Justice Association was established to identify problems of the judiciary and come up with solution proposals, and to this day, it has done root cause analyses on judicial reform and created the Full and Frank Disclosure proposal, which is the most critical proposition for our legal system; it has released this proposal to the senior executives of the Ministry of Justice and to the public through an event to which the representatives of the Ministry of Justice were also invited. The issue mentioned in Objective 8.2(a) is the original proposal of our Association which was accepted in the legal community.

The proposal of the Better Justice Association to establish a “Higher Institution of Justice” is also known to the public. In addition, with contributions of members of the association, in the work written by Att. Mehmet Gün, president of association, named “Turkey’s Middle Democracy Problems and Solutions: Judiciary, Accountability and Justice in Representation”, the structural problems of the Turkish judiciary and the root causes of these problems are examined; and comprehensive recommendations are made for the evolution of institutions and for the reform on procedures and processes. In addition to this, a 35-page declaration was accepted, which was announced in August 2012 for the Better Justice Movement before the establishment of the association and which was sent to the Ministry of Justice and the top judicial authorities on the occasion of the opening of the judicial year. Said declaration included identifications and recommendations with 195 articles under main headings. When the issues mentioned in all three strategy documents are compared with these 195 articles and headings, it is seen that our Association's declaration alone can be the basis for a comprehensive judicial reform.

It is not clear from the document on which aspect of strategy creation the institutions and individuals participating in the studies expressed their opinions in conferences, meetings or bilateral meetings held with them, and whether these views serve the purpose of the strategy, and if so, in which direction. The questions asked or the answers received during these meetings, or how these meetings were evaluated in the creation of the strategy cannot be understood from the content of the document. What is known consists of the statements, which were reflected on the media, by some judicial officers and elements that are responsible for providing the service.

We would like to state that for the upcoming strategy studies, the inclusion and mapping of stakeholders and ensuring that each stakeholder makes the highest contribution by establishing a methodology in accordance with scientific principles will help determining the situation and obtaining results in a much more effective way, and that our Association is ready to work voluntarily.

Detection and Analysis of Problems, and Detection of Root Causes

It is not enough for the strategy only to determine the complaints and to make a plan and commitments to eliminate these complaints. Public opinion surveys and explanations of different segments in different environments related to the service may allow the identification of complaints and perhaps the recognition of some problems. Full detection and scientific evaluation of complaints enable identification of the problems that cause such complaints.

The detection of problems can often be put forward and accepted as an excuse for complaints.

For example, the reason for the delay in the proceedings is the heavy workload in the judiciary. If we stop at this point after detecting this, it will not be possible to solve the problem or to eliminate the complaints. If we proceed with the same example and continue to ask questions like “Why is there a heavy workload problem in the judiciary?” or “Why does the judiciary, which charges their services as they wish, complain about heavy workload while everyone is striving to increase their work?”, we will set out to determine the root causes of the problems that we put forward as an excuse.

As a matter of fact, with the explanations made under Objective 8 of JRS 2019 document, the determination of the Better Justice Association that it disclosed to the public, regarding the fact that the root cause of the problem of extension in the legal proceedings is the failure of the "honesty rule" in Article 29 of the Code of Civil Procedure, is accepted and it is said that improvements will be made in this regard. However, the Document does not contain the basic and common results of the failure creating this root cause. As a result of this failure, the trust amongst the main elements of the judiciary, namely judges, prosecutors and attorneys was destroyed, a complete distrust have arisen and this made a healthy trial impossible and even worse, the judiciary have corrupted the society even though it was expected to rehabilitate the society; thus, these issues have not been taken into consideration.

From this perspective, the Judicial Reform 2019 document does not fully identify the complaints and the problems that cause such complaints; it states their generality, but attempts to find solutions without examining the relations between the problems on the one hand and without examining the root causes of these problems on the other hand.

For example, in the Document, the completion of cases in a single hearing is addressed in Objective 4 and Objective 7; it is indicated as an activity objective in Target 4.8, but the reasons why the cases cannot be concluded in a "single hearing" are not investigated.

However, when the reasons for the continuous and systematic violation of the “single hearing” principle are investigated, many problems will appear, such as:

- (i) that a hearing is opened before the files are completed and that a hearing is required to collect evidence;

- (ii) that the procedural rules for the submission of evidences remain archaic and primitive and that their collection is both laborious and deferred;
- (iii) that the authority given to lawyers to collect evidence is disreputable, insufficient and unenforceable;
- (iv) that the parties could not rely on counterparty declarations even in the case of facts, and that no case admissions of the facts take place, thus collection of evidence becomes a requirement to be carried out;
- (v) that the obligation of the judge to have an expert examination done instead of just evaluating the expert opinions to reach a conclusion, and the fact that not the parties but the judge has to call for expert examination (depending on the complex problems of the experts) require postponement of hearings;
- (vi) that the working habits and procedural rules of the courts are not appropriate for and even prevent the expert, witness and other sources to be prepared in a single hearing.

These problems have a common cause, which is the fact that "the rule of honesty in the proceedings" has not been realized! Being not able to rely on the statements made by the parties and their lawyers to the court on the subject of dispute is the root cause of these problems. When the facts and evidence are provided to the court honestly and completely and when mechanisms to do this are established, all the above-mentioned problems will be eliminated and it will be possible that cases will be completed in a single hearing and concluded through discussions as it should be.

When these problems are solved, it will be very easy to realize the principle of single hearing. The first and fundamental step to the solution of this problem is that the parties (as well as their attorneys and 3rd parties) must tell the truth in their statements to the court and to each other during the dispute resolution process, and that they must fully and frankly disclose the facts they know and the evidences under their control.

Academicians made a mistake in this regard; they took lying to the court within the scope of the right to remain silent; identified the concealment of evidence necessary for the settlement of the dispute from the court as the prohibition of self-accusation despite the fact that they are in hand and controlled; and by combining the constraints of proof with this, they rendered the legal proceedings incapable of revealing the material truth, allowing the citizens and lawyers to lie perfectly in court and causing corruption in society.

Likewise, they considered the prohibition of amending of the case as not expanding the facts explained to the court or to increase the subject matter of the case/object of litigation. As a result of this, they developed a weird notion of prohibition of amendment of claim and defense, and they made the dispute resolution processes useless just like the wild west.

All these have prevented the judiciary from generating added value for the society from which it emanated and whose sources it uses, and made the judiciary a burden and a cost to the society. The parties can of course remain silent in court! However, the fact that they have the right to silence does not justify lying to the court; lying cannot be considered a right of defense. Of course, converting a compensation case into an eviction case cannot be accepted due to the nature of the judgment! However, this prohibition cannot be the justification for not seeing the deficiencies in the material facts, preventing them from being seen, and preventing the evidence required for the proof of defense from being revealed because of procedural restrictions. As long as Turkey does not wholly and radically change its approach in this regard, it cannot solve its judicial problems. Therefore, these issues (the fact that the rule of honesty is not realized; on the contrary, dishonest behavior is accepted in the court and considered good) are the main root cause. It is clear that radical solutions cannot be found for problems until this root cause is identified and accepted.

Another example that shows that the Judicial Reform Strategy 2019 document acts without investigating the root cause of the problems that cause complaints is seen in the perspective and action statements regarding the main objective of “fundamental rights and freedoms”. The document aims to “resolve complaints” about this important issue too; it identifies the problem by acknowledging that these complaints result from the application, but it does not go beyond that point.

If the rules of law are as they are stated in the document, then why do unlawful situations that are subject to complaints arise in practice? In other words, why do prosecutors and judges enforce law in a manner that causes complaints, and not as described in the Document?

As a result, it should be stated that reaching the root cause of the problems by asking the right questions will make it possible to determine a strategy that will bring solutions and make the targets set reachable.

About Main Perspectives (Point of View and Framework) and Assumptions

There are some pleasing expressions in the Document such as “Strong emphasis on strengthening democracy as well as improving, expanding and strengthening rights and freedoms in Turkey”; the zero-tolerance approach to torture and ill-treatment and the achievements in this regard will be maintained; as well as the statement “detention should be exceptional and it must be applied in compulsory situations in a limited manner, and the duration of detention should be reasonable and the legislation will be assessed and amended together with practice ”.

It is everyone's desire to fight terrorism and terrorist organizations in an effective and determined manner for the survival of our state, and peace and security in society. But the fight against terrorism cannot justify the unjust and unreasonable limitation of the rights and freedoms of innocent people. The sensitive and fine line in this regard will be drawn by the judicial bodies with their decisions. This will also eliminate the excuses that have been put forward to avoid cooperation in the fight against terrorism; international cooperation will strengthen Turkey's hand and arguments in the fight against terrorism.

Therefore; instead of the statement "We are committed to protecting fundamental rights and freedoms; but we can compromise if it comes to the fight against terrorism", it would be a more appropriate statement to say, in line with the indicated intention of the Document, that "measures will be taken to minimize the restrictions on rights and freedoms that may be caused by the fight against terrorism and to prevent innocent people from being accused or deprived of their rights, and the judiciary will be strengthened accordingly”.

On the other hand, the statement “The document should also be read as a guide for practitioners" in Article 9 on page 7, can be perceived as the “independent and impartial” judicial authorities are being instructed through this Document. Such perception would contradict the will of "strengthening the democracy" in Article 7 on page 7 of the Document and may undermine the credibility of the Document. Because the existence of a fully independent, effective, transparent and accountable judicial power is essential for democracy.

On page 9 of the JRS 2019 Document, in Articles 19 to 24, it is stated that Turkey sees EU membership as a strategic target, that for this reason, it attaches importance to liberal and participatory democracy, that the Part 23 titled “Judiciary and Fundamental Rights” is of particular importance, and that Turkey's integration into the EU will be a historic milestone in achieving international peace and stability.

Page 9, Article 24 states “the will for reform rises on the basis of social demands, going beyond political objectives [required for accession to the EU].”.

Taking into account the part "Justice, Freedom and Security" No. 24 in the upcoming studies will further improve the Strategy Document.

By having a fully independent, effective, transparent and accountable judiciary, Turkey can have a liberal and participatory democracy by way of spreading the rule of law across all parts of society, particularly the public, and preserving and developing freedom of thought and expression, and it can increase its prosperity to the level of developed countries. Having an advanced legal order and democracy, Turkey acts as the key to a better understanding between the East and West and the formation of effective interaction and cooperation between them. If this happens, Turkey can open the door to great opportunities not only for itself but also for its sensitive geography, its neighbors and the world by making important contributions to ensuring peace and stability in international level and preventing conflicts in the world.

Therefore, it is not correct to bind and condition Turkey's efforts -to democratize and reform its institutions accordingly- to the EU membership. At the same time, it should be noted that the perspective of EU membership is a very important anchor for Turkey in the field of democracy, law and the judiciary and that every step to be taken in this direction will bring Turkey closer to its supreme ideal. Turkey should not forget the need to reform for its own future and purposes.

In Articles 25 to 35 on pages 10 and 11 of the JRS 2019 Document; it is stated that the judicial power also provides balance between powers in the system of separation of powers, and the importance of the principle of separation of powers, which has been strengthened [with the introduction of the presidential executive system], and the constitutional function of the judiciary is vital for a strong and complete democracy. However, other parts of the Document do not include purposes or activities, for example, about what kind of a balance should be ensured between parliament and the president and what the judiciary can do for it, or how the judiciary will rule the law against the president or public officials.

Therefore, it is an important deficiency that no complaints or problems have been identified to ensure that the balance between the legislation and the executive power or that the organs and elements of the executive power are in compliance with the law. It should be underlined that the judiciary that cannot ensure the rule of law against the executive power and the elements of the executive, cannot ensure the lawfulness of the executive or justice among natural persons.

The most important finding in the document is, in our opinion, that the close relationship between law and economy, and a well-functioning legal system will improve the investment environment. In order for the law to contribute to economic success, it is necessary to create a foreseeable and predictable investment environment where long-term plans can be made, and to build trust in this regard. The first condition hereof is to protect the fundamental rights and freedoms at the highest level and the second condition is the compliance of the executive power with law. However, among these important issues, the Document remains silent about the executive's compliance.

The Document emphasizes that the right to be heard, the right to trial within a reasonable time and the right to access to justice, which are among different elements of the right to fair trial, are being violated in the functioning of the justice system. It is stated that, in order to minimize such violations, there is a need for systems to protect against inefficiency due to insufficient preparation in cases [which is considered to be the possible cause], to reduce disputes [to lessen inefficient processes that are seen as the cause of violations] and to eliminate them before coming to the court.

Although it has a relatively broader coverage than other perspectives, it is still not correct to limit the perspective of the "Operation of the Justice System" to what is stated in the Document and to the extent it is included. As the reform document aims to improve functioning of the justice system and to ensure that it provides better services, this perspective should have been put forward in the most comprehensive and sufficient way. In addition, considering the main issues related to the functioning of the justice system, it would be more appropriate to sort them in the following order:

- (i) system structure,
- (ii) human resources,
- (iii) procedures and processes applied and obeyed while providing service,
- (iv) generated products and outputs,
- (v) whether the services and products meet the needs of the receivers, their quality and the satisfaction level of the receivers,
- (vi) content, duration, method of delivery, value and cost balance of services, and present them in such configuration. This configuration is also vital with regard to how the team carrying out this study looks at the issue, how they see the current situation and how the current situation is identified in the studies carried out. However, the statements in this respect in the Document are not sufficient.

About Developments in the Second JRS Period

On pages 12 to 16 of JRS 2019, Articles 36 to 66 describe the developments in the Second JRS Period, i.e. between 2015 and 2019. Since the 2019 document is an update, the information here is considered to be provided for the purpose of monitoring and evaluating the realization of the objectives and targets in the 2015 document. However, it would have been correct to provide the information given for this purpose by following the structure and numbering in the 2015 Strategy Document scientifically. It is almost impossible for the reader to make an assessment of how much of the targets and objectives in the 2015 document has been achieved and why the unfulfilled ones have not been achieved, unless special effort and an exhausting comparison is made.

The abolition of the military courts referred to in Article 37 is a positive development; however, such development is not one of the objectives or targets of the 2015 document.

The establishment of a Human Rights Compensation Commission referred to in Article 39 is a positive development; but there is no information about the performance of this institution to date, nor about the reasons that make it necessary to transfer individual applications at the Constitutional Court to this commission through a subsequent law. The reader would be right to consider that the violations of the right to fair trial are at a very high level; that the Constitutional Court cannot cope with these; and that the possibility to apply to the European Court of Human Rights was effectively closed by directing the applications to the commission.

Positive developments include the publication of activity reports by the courthouses and the development of alternative dispute resolution methods. It is not correct to make matters related to the free will of the parties, such as conciliation and arbitration compulsory, and the coercion in this respect is not consistent with the theory of judiciary either. Although it seems to provide a solution in short term, it is likely to cause more serious problems in the future.

Disputes are not “goods and chattels” of courts; the subject of dispute belongs to the parties and they may dispose as they wish. The duty of the court is to resolve the dispute fairly as long as desired. It is wrong both in terms of principles and process management to consider the dispute as a property left to the court, and to involve the courts too much into the matter of expertise, which directly concerns the parties' claims and defenses and forms part of the claim and defense.

It is a direct and unjust interference with the claim and defense right of the parties that to make the judge find out, assign and monitor the expert as if said judge were the attorney of both the claimant and the defendant; to treat experts, who are all natural persons, as if they were informal judges; and to protect them by almost bringing them into the position of deputy judge. Expertise in its traditional form in judicial practices in Turkey is an institution which has caused the corruption of the courts and is itself quite corrupt. The fact that the institution of expertise is being institutionalized more and more stringently each day, as well as the fact that this corrupt institution is being protected both administratively and judicially, carries the corruption and degeneration in expertise directly to the judiciary. Regarding the matter of expertise, which even inspired a song with the lyrics “I am your expert; I will examine you!”, the role of the state and the courts should be limited to keeping a solid record of the experts and enforcing dissuasive sanctions against those who failed to perform their duties properly.

In the case that claim and defense of the parties require opinions of an expert, the parties should be able to obtain it themselves and submit it to the court, subject to a discipline to be determined according to law by the courts. In such a case, the ones who write the reports issued to convince the court and the other party on a topic should be held responsible as if they were assigned by the court, and they should be obliged to attend the hearings, which will be “single hearings”, and to answer the questions.

UYAP (National Judiciary Informatics System) has introduced many innovations and convenience to the judiciary. However, in today's world, where information systems are quite advanced, what UYAP does is very little compared to what it has to do and what a good information-communication system can do.

For example, UYAP should carry publicity to contemporary levels by offering the possibility of watching the proceedings that are of interest for thousands of people, through a screen.

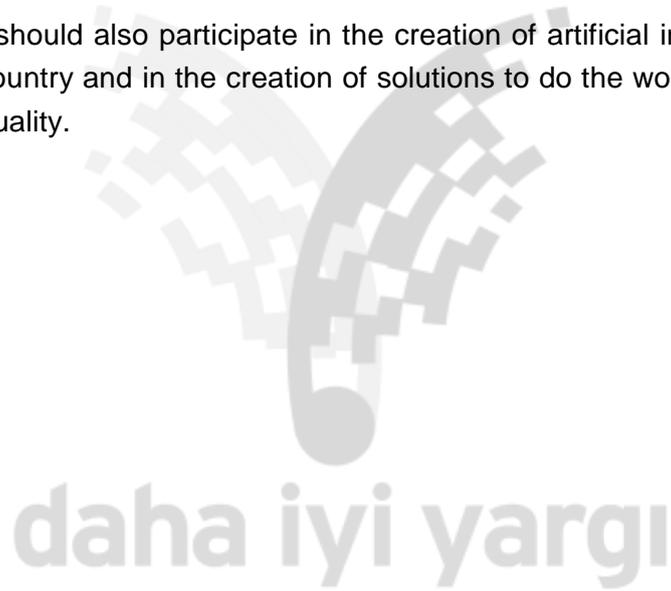

Today, many known websites can transmit millions of live video recordings to millions of people simultaneously.

UYAP must not be a means of releasing judges from the humanitarian accountability they undertake by looking at the faces of lawyers and parties. A citizen should receive the decision about their petition announced by a judge, not the decision visible on a computer screen.

On the other hand, the instant recording functions by UYAP should be used for judges' performance evaluation and similar procedures. Performance management systems should be developed for this purpose.

UYAP is also directly related to tens of thousands of law practitioners working outside courthouses. UYAP should enable, guide, encourage and benefit from the development and integration of applications and software in line with the needs of these sectors.

UYAP should also participate in the creation of artificial intelligence for the law field in our country and in the creation of solutions to do the work more efficiently and with better quality.

Assessment About Objectives and Activities

Objective 1: Protection and Development of Rights and Freedoms

Under the Objective 1: “Protection and Promotion of Rights and Freedoms”, it is stated that: (1) legislation shall be amended to improve standards; (2) a new human rights action plan shall be prepared and implemented to eliminate the violations determined in the Constitutional Court and the ECHR (European Court of Human Rights) decisions by taking into consideration the international observation reports with NGOs; (3) training activities shall be held on human rights, particularly in terms of justification of the arrest warrants; (4) compliance with the decisions of the Constitutional Court and the ECHR shall be observed during audits to progress in profession.

The most important reason for the existence of the judiciary is to protect rights and freedoms. Violations of and damages to fundamental rights and freedoms by judicial decisions are not an acceptable flaw in a constitutional state. On the other hand, protecting the rights and freedoms of individuals, especially the freedom of thought and expression, is one of the most important conditions for democracy. Within this framework, the existence of pluralist media operating freely will be the guarantee for fundamental rights and freedoms by ensuring that such rights and freedoms are not violated, and if so, it can be seen by whom, when and where. For this reason, pluralist media is considered to be the 4th power of democracies.

The awareness trainings and performance rating stated to be done are not sufficient to prevent violation of rights done through the decisions that judicial bodies take or do not take, or the actions they approve or do not prevent.

For example, it is not a performance or disciplinary issue that an artist who has the right to remain silent is taken to the police station at any time of the day to give a statement because a complaint has been filed against them in a place they have gone to perform, and that they are taken to the public prosecutor only after their working hours begin, and then they are released.

But this attitude restricts that person's freedom for one night and prevents them from doing their job; not to mention the hardship and psychological difficulties they would have experienced.

Let us take a look at a very simple example from a newspaper in the UK: It seems like there is nothing important when a prosecutor, who wants to investigate a book of the author Elif Şafak, sends a police officer to the publisher company to bring copies of the book. However, in a civilized country where there is freedom of thought and expression and where the media is free, the police cannot go to a media organization although they know that people will fear them. Can't the prosecutor, who wants to investigate the issue and file a lawsuit, pay the money to buy the book from a bookstore?

Another example is the way the dean of a law faculty was treated, who is one of the most valuable scientists in our country. Sending the police to the house of this scientist at dawn, although it is known from the very beginning that he would never run away and would show up if a letter was sent to him, is an example of serious violation of fundamental rights and freedoms even if the judicial authorities were performing their duties and there is no disciplinary or performance problems in this situation.

Another point that must be stated here is that prosecutors give the law enforcement the duty and authority to take statements and then they also take the statements themselves. Having duties limited to assist the investigation and to collect evidence, the law enforcement cannot be authorized to take the suspect's statement. While everyone knows that this situation harms the reputation of the law enforcement before the citizens and that it is the reason that the citizens are afraid to go to the police station, it is unimaginable that the judicial authorities do not know it. If this practice is going to continue and the citizen is going to give statement at the police station, there must be a prosecutor at all police stations to ensure that rights and freedoms are protected.

In order to prevent judicial authorities from violating fundamental rights and freedoms, in addition to what is stated in the Document; especially the way the public prosecutors can use their authorities must be regulated in a very detailed manner; and all actions and decisions that might limit people's rights and freedoms even to the lowest degree possible must be subject to decisions to be made by courts established with this purpose in particular.

Another aspect is about judicial polices. Although judicial polices were brought with the aim of protecting rights and freedoms, their arrest warrants, especially when it comes to offenses such as insults made only for once, have created the impression that personal freedom in the country is up to people outside the two courts.

The fact that the objection against the decisions of the judicial polices are decided by another judicial police and that the appeal is not decided by the competent court that is the expert of the subject is also effective in creating this impression. Probably, the most important reason for this is that CJP members who appoint judicial polices have been appointed by the executive and legislative political parties.

This has caused public concerns that politicians can regulate the judiciary as they wish, and that they can arrest and imprison anyone.

It must be ensured that evidence and inquiry courts are established in this regard; that all actions that limit freedom (except for the cases where prosecutors invite suspects by letter) are subject to the decision of these courts and that the decisions of this court can be appealed at a higher court. Additionally, in applications such as taking the suspect at night or at dawn from their room, or from the airport, which have recently raised public concerns, it must be ensured that the suspect is brought to trial and released as soon as possible.

Objective 2: Improving the Independence, Impartiality and Transparency of the Judiciary

Although the Strategy Document acknowledges that the independence of judiciary has universal criteria, it also defends the situation that contradicts the established universal principles by stating that the choice of countries is determinant in this regard and that countries also have historical experiences and traditions.

Regarding said historical experience, the Strategy Document only states that when judges and prosecutors are elected members twice for CJP as per the Constitutional amendment in 2010, right before the Constitutional amendment in 2017, judges and prosecutors as well as the public got the idea that this situation affected the judicial labor peace negatively and caused political polarization. It is not mentioned that this result was caused by the election method applied, and that serious politicization in judiciary already existed at that time. Factors that had more effect in the creation of this result are not mentioned either. The capability of judicial elements to elect members for judicial boards is a requirement accepted across the EU. On the other hand, the fact that other employees are represented on the management level in modern management systems is critical for taking healthy management decisions and ensuring the efficiency of institutions.

The Strategy Document, where it is stated that some disciplinary decisions of CJP will be appealed, does not consider the following facts as historical bad experiences: that in this respect, with the amendment made in 1977 about the closure of judicial review and auditing channels CJP (CHJ) decisions, Constitutional Court decided for annulment as it considered it "in contradiction with nature of the republic, the state of law and equality before the law"; that the military junta introduced this unconstitutional arrangement into the law in 1981 and into the Constitution in 1982; and in this way, "the way to legal auditing against the decisions of CJP was closed".

On the contrary, stating that the fact that the members are being elected by the executive and judicial (political parties) as per the Constitutional amendment in 2017 means strengthening the democratic legitimacy of CJP, the Strategy Document adopts the political rhetoric "it has been based on the principles of 'independence' and 'impartiality' with the Constitutional amendment in 2017"; it does not see any problem in the current structure of CJP.

Of course, the adoption of this rhetoric is not a problem for a political policy document. For this reason, the Strategy Document is considered a policy document by our Association.

The fact that the Strategy Document was not built on the idea of a healthy "judicial independence" can be understood from the statement "There are many basic instruments for ensuring judicial independence. They all serve to strengthen judges and prosecutors."

This is because the Document completely ignores the "ability to function independently", which is the most important aspect of judicial independence; it does not see that the judiciary cannot function unless its superiors give permission regarding executive officials; and that even CJP, the judicial supreme body, cannot function without the elements of the executive, i.e. the Minister of Justice and the undersecretary.

The document considers judicial independence only as strengthening judges and prosecutors; however, it only promises limited progress in this regard. In addition to acknowledging that said judicial elements cannot be independent or impartial even regarding the things promised to strengthen their independency and impartiality, the Strategy Document that states "Targets have been set for professional strengthening of judges and prosecutors." does not contain anything new or significant in this regard.

The most exciting aspect of the document is the proposal for action to provide geographical guarantee to a number of judges in Target 2.1(a). Unless a way for judicial review and auditing is created against the assignment decisions of CJP, said guarantee shall not constitute a provision or provide organizational trust.

In other words, this guarantee will only be effective if the possibility of appealing against the decisions of CJP is also introduced.

In the activities in Target 2.1, it is stated that the interview examination at the entrance to judgeship and prosecution will be done by a committee based on wide delegation.

For entering these important professions, it is important and required not to settle for written exams only that test professional and general knowledge of candidates, but to do interviews as well.

The public complains not about the interview but the way it is done. It is quite normal that many people who got a very high score in the written exam but were eliminated in the interview think that the interviews are not impartial and that those who are in the interview commission and those who are influential are given privileges to some candidates. On the other hand, it is not clear what kind of principles are used for this exam, what questions are asked for what purposes and what criteria are used to evaluate the answers. Interviews, which were recorded previously, are now not being recorded. So, the non-recording, hence the non-accountability that was also used by FETÖ (Fethullahist Terrorist Organization) to favor its members when it was active, is still continuing. The public has some strong concerns that after FETÖ was cleared of the judiciary, decisions are made in these interviews according to the preferences of the government. As it is widely known by the public, the fact that candidates who will attend the interview are trying to find influential politicians is enough for this interview to lose reliability.

Having the trust of the ruling party cannot be considered sufficient or necessary to be assigned to these professions. If a person has a history that prevents them from being appointed to these professions, it is the responsibility of the security and intelligence units of the state to investigate and find out about such situation. Interviews cannot function as a reliability test or intelligence verification at the last stage. Moreover, the interviews and the resulting decisions do not meet the transparency and accountability criteria, which are the basic conditions for a democratic management.

The main function of the interviews should be to reveal competencies of those who have proved in the written exam that they have sufficient knowledge.

Interviews are basically mini tests for aspects that cannot be questioned in the written examination but are possible to be revealed orally, and provide more accurate results when supported with psychological tests. Said interviews assess the person's discernment; personal attitude, stance and approach; competency in acquiring, compiling, evaluating and using information; determining and solving questions.

Therefore, it must be ensured that these interviews are structured; that the topics to be asked or discussed are categorized based on these main aspects; that these interviews are recorded to ensure that objection and lawsuit is possible when required; and that the interviews are supported with psychological tests that are quite advanced in determining the areas of tendency and competency of persons.

Moreover, Target 2 states that the interview for entering the profession will be done by a wider delegation committee; that the legislation for the appointment and transfer of judges and prosecutors will be restructured; that the system is going to be in line with a reasonable and predictable schedule; that the appointment, transfer and promotion system will be reconstructed based on performance and qualifications in an objective manner; that said system will be improved; that geographical guarantee will be ensured for judges and prosecutors with a certain level of seniority; that the power of the Minister of Justice to delegate temporary duty will be annulled; that the minimum seniority conditions for certain tasks will be renewed; that the judicial ethics will be strengthened by determining ethical principles, monitoring practices and providing pre-service and post-service trainings; that the disciplinary procedure will be reconstructed; that the scope of activity reports will be expanded in the ordinary and administrative judiciary; that a report assessment system will be introduced; that the reports will be analyzed to take measures to improve performance; that the recognition of reports will be increased through central and local press releases; that stakeholders will be included in the process to draw up legislation proposals; that regulatory impact analysis reports will be shared with the public; that the culture of participation and negotiation in the judiciary will be improved; and that it will be ensured that relevant institutions, organizations, the civil society as well as persons from academic and social environments participate in the processes.

All judges should be provided with geographical guarantee and seat guarantee; and just like the judge himself/herself, the public should also know from the very beginning the court and courthouse where the relevant judge will be working, as well as the working period. It should also be ensured that each case is concluded with a decision by the judge who was in charge at the time it was filed. The performance of a judge should not be judged by the number of files they rule but by -for example- how quickly they have made a decision about the application made, and the quality of the decision.

Written examinations and oral interviews for admission to the judicial profession must be designed to ensure that competent persons are chosen and that there is no doubt that no discrimination or favoring exists; said examinations and interviews must be designed and audited to allow transparent and judicial audit.

Judges and related parties should be given the opportunity to file a case before a specially created court against the decisions of the CJP and the Justice Commission on appointments, determination of the place of duty, dismissal, designation and advancement and similar issues.

Target 2.3 states “Judicial ethics will be strengthened.”. Ethics is, of course, a good thing if it can be achieved. Because ethics is the science of social morals; morals tell us what is right and what is wrong to do. Things that should be done and should not be done are sometimes turned into positive rules. Then, morals show up again to tell us if the positive rules are to be applied, and if so, how they are to be applied. Ethical rules require proper and virtuous behavior; however, if there are no appropriate sanctions, behaviors depend on what the relevant person wants deep inside, and the personal ego and needs often prevail over universal ethics and rules.

Where the judiciary is not transparent or accountable; and where there is no possibility for legal application against the decisions made by CJP about the judicial elements or decisions made by judicial elements about their colleagues; in other words, where there is no judicial auditing, talking about judicial ethics prevent the judiciary and the document from being taken seriously by the public.

For these reasons, ethical rules must be created and published to strengthen the judicial ethics, and sanctions must be determined for non-compliances to ensure that said rules are followed.

Objective 3: Improving the Quality and Quantity of Human Resources

In order to improve the quality and quantity of human resources of the judiciary, in the Strategy Document, it is stated (1) that a new model will be developed to enhance the quality of legal education; (2) that an examination will be introduced for entry to legal professions, and the successful ones will take the exams to become deputy judges, deputy prosecutors and deputy notary publics; (3) that the deputy judges and prosecutors will participate in the justice service and that they will also take further exams to become judges and prosecutors; (4) that pre-vocational and on-the-job training will be improved, as well as being continuous and compulsory, and the number of judges and prosecutors who study foreign languages and postgraduate degrees will be increased;

(5) that the training of judicial staff will be increased; (6) that the curriculum of vocational schools of justice will be diversified and the graduates will be given priority; (7) and that the number of judges, prosecutors and employees will be increased in proportion to the actual workload.

First of all, it must be stated that it is not possible to improve the quality of human resources without improving the quality of the judiciary, i.e. the quality of the work processes and services. This is a simple matter of management. Qualified human resources can only be procured to do qualified jobs.

If the work done is low quality, the human resources -no matter how qualified- will deteriorate and drop to the quality level of that work. Improving the quality of the work done and being patient and disciplined to render services in line with this quality is enough to improve the quality of human resources. This is a prerequisite.

For this reason, first of all, the focus must be on ensuring that the methods for rendering services in the judiciary are on a level that is comparable to its contemporaries. In this regard, quality can be improved by ensuring that the principle of honesty is applied through full and frank reveal of facts and evidence in dispute resolution; that in judiciary, workload is distributed evenly among the human resources; and that it is made obligatory for the defendants, attorneys and prosecutors to get adequately prepared. To do this, while improving the quality of work, the focus should be on improving the quality of human resources in parallel with this. In the order of importance, quantitative increase in human resources should come after this. It should be noted that in the absence of efficient work, quantitative rise in human resources increases the complexity and complications, reduces efficiency and makes problems even worse. In this regard, experience of the United Kingdom should be used; which achieved a conciliation rate of 98% in cases, and lessons that might be beneficial for Turkey must be learned from the difference between the experience of the United Kingdom and that of Germany, which achieved a conciliation rate of around 38% with more judges and a higher budget compared to the former.

In Target 3.2, the examination to enter legal professions is regarded as a quality-improving measure that can be taken in the fastest way possible and maintained in the current situation of legal education. However, this examination also shows that the education in law faculties and the exams held to get a faculty degree are inadequate and unreliable. After the examinations taken for secondary and higher education, introduction of another examination for entering the profession means that the whole future of young people depend on the answers they will give in this one or two-hours examination, causing promising young people to move to foreign countries only because of these exams.

Turkey has to establish a system as soon as possible to ensure that the education offered at universities, examinations held during the educational period and the results of such examinations can be relied on without hesitation. To this end, centralized examination methods can be introduced for educational periods to find much more modern solutions that improve the quality of education. In law courses, which are already subject to approval of YÖK (The Council of Higher Education), using a fully centralized examination system throughout the educational period may help eliminate the inequality between people who graduate from different faculties, and in some cases, faculties that have limited number of academicians. This way, quality of the education at such faculties can be improved.

Introduction of an entrance examination for entering legal professions must be designed in a way to ensure that it will not violate the vested rights of students who are already studying at law faculties; current students of law faculties must not be victimized. In light of the above, it must be considered to centralize course-passing exams -at least for basic courses- at the faculties instead of introducing an exam for entering legal professions. The state must not make our young children pay the price for its own failure in providing quality education.

On the other hand, holding an examination for the relevant people to start working as deputy judges, prosecutors and notaries and to start the law internship would be appropriate for the desired quality improvement, as it would ensure that those who pass these exams will then take the entrance exams to the professions only after working enough to gain adequate experience and maturity and becoming -not symbolically or perfunctorily but- fully competent in what they do, on the condition that they are paid during this preparation period a suitable fee in line with their educational status. However, if the idea of examination at different stages of the profession is accepted to improve quality, it must be ensured that these examinations are not held only in the stage of entrance into profession but also in each stage that represents a milestone of progress in the profession. Moving up to higher levels in profession should provide monetary benefits in a manner to compensate for the personal investment in education including the additional costs caused by the high performance in the profession. In legal professions, this necessitates the harmonization of the competency and capacity of human resources with the requirements of the work to be done.

Currently, the aim is to bring together the requirements of legal works and the competencies of human resources while determining duties of the courts. Our judges get seniority according to their working time and performance; more difficult, heavier and specialty works are assigned to the more senior ones. A similar career plan must be made for prosecutors, lawyers and notary publics.

Attorneyship also needs a career plan to be made in a manner to ensure that attorneys improve rapidly; that the transfer of knowledge and experience from seniors to younger ones is accelerated and institutionalized; that personal and professional rights of attorneys who are new to the profession and working with others are protected and improved; and that the best service possible is offered to society.

In legal professions, career plans should be parallel to and compatible with each other, transition between professions should be easy according to the needs of the society.

Regarding career planning in legal professions, attorneyship in particular, there are good examples from all over the world with respect to the benefits that such plans offer to the society and the compatibility of such plans with the culture.

As a start, the culture of Ahi community, which is contained within the Turkey's rich history, provides a solid system in conformity with the human nature for career planning.

In addition to this, the separate trial advocacy system in the UK and Japan ensures that the trials in these countries are of high quality and in compliance with the highest standards. This reduces the number of disputes submitted to the court and increases the number of conciliations in the cases. Turkey needs to take steps towards a similar system. For example, trials before the Courts of Peace, First Instance, High Criminal Courts or Commercial, Appeal and Cassation Courts can be separated, and a suitable seniority and specialization for these can be planned accordingly.

Objective 4: Improving Performance and Productivity

“Expert reviews taking long periods of time and requiring repetitions by experts do not present a rational appearance. [...] it is expected that the new system of expertise will be implemented in this period in all aspects by eliminating the disruptions seen in practice.” This quotation from JRS is a sign that the strategy lacks root cause analysis.

Why do the expert reviews take long time and repeat? Well-known answers are as follows: The experts found by courts are in fact not experts or specialized in their fields. It is difficult to find an expert and it takes long time to search for one. The work to be done by the expert when they are found is not explained; experts spend time on summarizing the case, advising on the decision to be made etc., activities which they should not actually be doing, thus almost replacing judges.

The experts' works are undisciplined, their reports are not auditable and often inadequate. It is not possible for an expert report to satisfy both parties as well as the judge.

How could these and similar other issues be solved? It is clear that using the experts like now will maintain these problems and that these cannot be corrected whatever is done. The root cause of the problem with the experts is the way they are being used.

“What could be the method to resolve these problems? “If we assign this task to the attorneys of the parties or the parties themselves; if two parties come together to find an expert; if each party determines what needs to be done for their own claim and ask this to the experts; if they keep questioning expert answers until they are satisfied; if the reports obtained this way are submitted to the court, discussed before the judge and the judge passes his/her own opinion about this, will these problems be resolved?” Asking such questions will bring along the solution to the problem.

All issues that might lead to concerns in leaving these authorities to attorneys and parties can be resolved through simple arrangements. For example, in case of any doubt as to who may be an expert, expertise records of the expert candidate can be submitted to the court and court approval can be sought. A list of experts can be created effectively by keeping records of experts. If it is said to the experts that the parties or the attorneys cannot take oath, the oath text of the expert can be written at the beginning of the report to ensure that they swear an oath before the notary, attorney or the court. In case of hesitation about the questions to be asked to the expert, the court may take the required acceptance or rejection decision on these matters.

If the expert's opinions are obtained by the parties and presented to the court, it will be possible to finalize the proceedings in a single hearing when the powers to collect evidence are given to the lawyers. Thus, it is possible to solve cases, which last for 4 - 5 years in first instance courts and where parties have to go to the courthouse 15 times on average and time is wasted, in a single hearing and at a reasonable cost within 50 to 100 days on average.

Only after this process that the modern methods of “time management in the judiciary”, “target durations” and “performance” mentioned in the document, some of which are said to be implemented and to be localized, shall be realized.

In other words, as long as all the necessary steps are not fully taken to implement the single hearing system, a perfectly functioning system is not designed, and the work load in the judiciary is not distributed reasonably and proportionately among the human resources; concepts such as time management, target time and performance management will remain hollow and be considered “ornamental”.

We think that in order to fulfill the aim of improving the performance and efficiency, facts and evidence must be stated honestly and completely through the right disclosure mechanism in the applications to the courts; the evidence required must be collected in the fastest way possible; expert opinions must be obtained jointly by the parties, and individually if they cannot agree, in the shortest time possible and as per the standards set by the court; the trial must start with the files completed and the trial must be ended in a single hearing.

The points stated under this objective heading must be left to the stage that follows the performance of the above-mentioned actions. When this first objective is realized, it will then be revealed that the issues that present themselves as a problem are not a problem anymore and they are seen as a problem only because other things are wrong, and probably most of them will be abandoned.

For example; it is of course useful to trace the proceedings exceeding the target periods, to determine the reasons and to take measures. However, target times must not affect the quality of the trial or cause violation of basic trial principles.

Delays in the collection of information and documents are the second most important problem in trials, following the matter of the institution of expertise. As stated above, this must be addressed and improved as an element of a whole picture.

Judges should be specialized not only in the disciplines of law, but also in the sectors where specialized courts offer services and in non-law disciplines. For example, judges who are going to work in fields such as patents, marine, energy, etc. must have expertise in the related field of science. This way, foundations of a system -for legal professions- can be laid that accepts only those who have at least undergraduate degree in at least one field of positive sciences in addition to legal education, as is the case in developed countries. Until such arrangement is made, it must be ensured that the existing legal professionals are provided intensive training on their areas of specialization and that they have expert-level knowledge in the field of science where they will be applying the law. Said training will also ensure that courts do not consult experts when it is not actually necessary.

Ensuring consistency and uniformity between judicial decisions provide predictability and improves both accountability and the faith in justice. Moreover, it reduces the number of disputes submitted to courts. It must be taken into account that the appeal system introduced to ease the appeal burden of the Court of Cassation -which it could not handle- increases contradictions between decisions and reduces uniformity; it must be ensured that there is not only self-auditing for appeal decisions through appealing and precedents, and that there is also a stringent and efficient observation and assessment mechanism to ensure compliance in precedent.

A more practical method must be developed for notifications, setting the systems in developed countries as examples. A party who has been duly notified once in a trial must not receive another notification except for the final decision. Considering that the digitization level of society in Turkey is relatively low, it must be avoided to make the electronic notification system compulsory. Electronic notification must start gradually from the institutions and individuals that should have professional management and should be spread to every section after making sure that it will not cause any problem. Initially, it should be introduced as an addition to the existing postal notification and as a facilitator (as a forerunner of the future notification); critical transactions must definitely be sent v,a mail, and relatively less important procedures must be done via electronic notification.

Advanced video conferencing systems allow people to make important decisions on many subjects by communicating without the need for traveling. In all proceedings apart from single-hearing trials, courts and parties must hold the hearing via the video conferencing system and make decisions. UYAP must be developed in this direction and it must be ensured that crowds of people do not go to courthouses to prevent them from wasting their valuable time in courthouses halls and courtrooms.

It must be highlighted that lawyers are made to waste most of their time in courthouses, walking around the corridors, and waiting in line for hours just for simple hearings that do not last even 5 minutes. In Istanbul, a lawyer should spend at least 2.5 hours for a 5-minute hearing. Implementing this system will completely resolve the complaint of not being able to comply with the time of hearing, which is a result of the current situation. The fact that the action proposal set out in Target 4.8, which is not enough to resolve the complaint, is the result of the fact that the root cause of the problem that caused this complaint was not analyzed.

It is possible to categorize the actions of parties and judges during trials as follows:

- (i) to identify the fact that is the subject of the dispute, to collect evidence and documents that can be use as proof, and to create the fact in full;
- (ii) to assess the evidence collected and to clearly identify the fact that is the subject of the dispute;
- (iii) to determine rules, laws and regulations regarding the subject of dispute;
- (iv) to compile doctrine views about how these should be interpreted;
- (v) to compile judicial precedents related to the practice; and
- (vi) to determine how this rule should be understood and implemented;
- (vii) to apply this rule in every case and
- (viii) to formulate and explain the decision to be made

From these items, number (ii) can be defined as clearly determining the data to be processed; (iii) to (vi) as determining the rule for the procedure to be carried out; and (vii) as carrying out the said procedure. Information technology, especially software robots, can be effective in all of the above; however, even having these robots do the scanning mentioned in groups no (ii) to (vi), which is the most important part of the work load of legal professionals at courts, can provide labor savings of 40-50%, or in other words, capacity increase, right at the beginning. To do this, there is no need for artificial intelligence algorithms or to make the computers able to understand and apply the relevant rules.

Artificial intelligence is the ability to have the actions mentioned in items (vii) and (viii) done. To this end, (i) to (vi) must be robotized first.

When evaluating the fact explanations of courts and evidences, information technology can also be used to ensure that the courts comply with objective principles and for monitoring purposes. For example, information technology can be used to match the alleged facts to the evidences presented; to examine the presented evidences with OCR technologies; after the judge has determined the objective criteria to be used to assess the evidence, to record these assessments; and to ensure that all of them are assessed when making a decision. For example, it is possible to record in an evidence review note the date of the evidence, whether it is forged or falsified, the result obtained from the evidence and the points that justify that result to ensure that the decision, which is the deduction of the judge, is controlled more correctly.

The new courthouse architecture must be designed to ensure that trials are finalized in a single hearing; for example, next to the hearing rooms, there must be suitable working rooms for the parties during the hearing, and the hearing should be in between. Citizens should be able to reach the relevant places in the courthouse such as the court office or the court room, and gigantic courthouse buildings should not be turned into the labyrinth in Kafka novels.

Objective 5: Ensuring the Effective Use of the Right of Defense

In Target 5.1, which states radical changes will be made for attorneyship, which is a public service, it is understood that an exam will be introduced for entrance to the profession of attorneyship with the aim of improving the quality of legal services, that intern lawyers will be able to work with insurance, that studies will be carried out regarding the duration and efficiency of the internship, and that working lawyers, including public defenders, will be granted special passports.

First of all, it must be highlighted that depriving lawyers -who are inarguably public officials- of their rights granted to public officials is unjust and clearly a contradiction. All their rights must be granted to lawyers, not just a green passport; the status, importance and authority required by this profession must be admitted.

The most important point to be highlighted in this respect is that the Document contains improvement of the quality of attorneyship. Different ideas can be stated about the “examination for entrance to legal professions”, which is also envisaged for judges, prosecutors, attorneys and notaries.

But the low quality of today’s inconstant law education makes such examinations inevitable.

However, adopting this idea will ensure that all legal issues are classified based on the level of importance and difficulty of the tasks; that the more experienced professionals do more difficult jobs; and that the less experienced ones are guided. Such arrangements exist in developed countries and they strengthen the justice and improve the competitiveness of the country by ensuring on-the-job training, specialization and focus. A country can be as strong as its legal professionals are in the international area. In this regard, Turkey is lagging in the international area.

In the Document, Target 5.2 states “It will be ensured that defense participates effectively in trials”, and as the actions, it is stated that the lawyers’ limited authority to collect evidence will be expanded; there will be more confidence in documents submitted by lawyers; it will be ensured that some works and procedures will be done through lawyers; that the idea of making representation with an attorney obligatory in some cases is being discussed; and that the tax burden on legal services will be reassessed.

First of all, the rule of honesty, concluding cases in a single hearing mentioned in Target 8.2(a), lawyers’ authority to do certain tasks and collect evidence as well as the confidence in the evidence they submit mentioned in Target 5.2 must all be considered as a whole.

For example, when clients are obliged to fully and frankly disclose the facts and evidence to the lawyer or to the court, the lawyer must then be liable to perform his/her duty in accordance with the purpose of this obligation and to ensure that the client fully conforms to this rule.

For this obligation to be fulfilled, it is required to grant the lawyer the authority to collect adequate evidence and information that will help decide if the case of the client is worth submitting to the court; and the parties involved must be obliged to meet the demands of the lawyer.

When the lawyer, awarded with this authorities and opportunities, is provided with the obligation to apply to the court as having evolved their own file, and where the sanctions and measures for non-compliance are determined, - for example; to be held accountable for the costs of proceedings, disciplinary proceedings, the shifting of the order of the case, etc. - lawyers will be very productive in a short time and at the same time, their trust and dignity will increase both for their clients and for the courts and the society.

It will be easier for judges to rely on the information found in files prepared and submitted as per this legal framework, and in particular, it will be possible to take preliminary and protective measures quickly.

In such an environment, it will automatically become compulsory for the lawyers to follow the lawsuits. No one will object to the introduction of this type of rule of obligation. This will also eliminate 9/10 of the workload of judges in civil proceedings, which can be done by lawyers in a very short time.

On the other hand, in such an environment, it will become clear that the current practice is unnecessary, where experts are found and assigned by the judge and nobody is satisfied with the study done or the resulting report; and the parties will find the experts themselves where needed and will be able to obtain their reports and submit them to the court in the shortest time possible.

In the 1990s, the United Kingdom, which corrected the proceedings in this direction, made tremendous progress; while advancing the attorneyship profession very quickly, its courts gained respectability globally and succeeded in attracting the settlement of disputes from other countries. According to statistics for 2012 of the Financial Times, they managed to create a law economy of 17 billion Pounds with 100 major law offices.

To solve its inured problems, Turkey must urgently implement proceedings similar to those in the United Kingdom.

Effective participation of defense in the proceedings, whether in the private or public sector, requires lawyers to do their jobs in accordance with the basic principles, taking accountability for the work they have got right from the beginning until the end, by giving explanations to the client as well as asking them for explanations. In line with this principle, in-house attorneys, public and treasury attorneys, attorneys in insurance and banks' law departments who do not practice as independent attorneys or attorneys in independent law firms should be prevented from representing their institutions as attorneys in courts and other jurisdictions. There should be no restriction for them in representing their institutions officially; however, they should not be allowed to represent them as attorneys or assume the powers and responsibilities that we propose for recognition above.

Objective 6: About the Target of Facilitating Access to Justice and Improving Satisfaction from Justice Services

First of all, it would be more appropriate to regulate satisfaction as a separate target from access to justice and services of justice, and to carry the topic of satisfaction to the heading of monitoring, measuring and assessing. However, it would also be appropriate to set service satisfaction as a separate target.

Setting different periods and principles for procedural processes subject to a limited time in civil, criminal, administrative and tax proceedings traps practitioners; unjustified loss of time and other reasons may result in loss of rights and these cannot be compensated.

Unifying the times may eliminate this, but care must be taken regarding the differences of trials that are of different natures. Likewise, a core procedure must be provided to be valid for all proceedings, in accordance with logical and scientific requirements, and as the nature of the trial differs, there must be additions to this basic core process.

Regarding time, an additional period of time must be introduced to compensate for the times missed due to humanitarian reasons, and the waste of time caused by humanitarian reasons must be compensated without causing any loss of rights.

For example, when there is administrative leave for religious holidays but the media reflects this as an official leave, causing people to loss time, those who were confused about whether the announcement was about an administrative one or a legislative act must be allowed to compensate for this by showing a acceptable excuse. Adding several days -as compensation period- to the exact times specified in law does not harm anyone or cause any delay, especially in courts.

As identified accurately in the document, it must be ensured that lack of jurisdiction and foreign plea are handled quickly without delaying the trial. It may be considered that when filing cases for this, instead of the court shown in the case, it should be sent to the court to be determined at the front office, or continue the current practice, but a quick decision and a final and accelerated decision on the appeal review might be taken.

Rules of duty and authority were introduced for the benefit of the state, not the citizen. The state is responsible for the fact that the citizen does not know the rules completely. The state must ensure that the citizen who needs its help finds the right court as soon as possible and should start that person's proceedings immediately.

Objective 7: Improving the Effectiveness of the Criminal Justice System

Care must be taken to transform the acts defined as crimes in the legislation into administrative sanctions. Including matters within the scope of the duties and functions of the judiciary in to the scope of the duties of administration may mean compromising the principle of the state of law.

In Target 7.1, our Association does not agree on the action proposals introduced under the heading "Pre-prosecution resolution instruments and investigation processes will be strengthened". Our reasons for opposing are as follows:

- a) Contrary to the proposed items, the discretionary power of public prosecutors should not be extended; on the contrary, their decision-making on indictment and non-investigation should be subject to the control and decision of the courts of inquiry and evidence.

Prosecutors are the first judicial authority that comes to the minds of citizens who think that they have been subjected to injustice. Therefore, being able to complain to prosecutors (although it may seem like occupying the judiciary unnecessarily) has an important function, which is ensuring that violence does not increase in society.

But this also leads to the dissolution of the belief in justice through prosecution offices. It is unfair for prosecutors to indict innocent people by filing an indictment and not to investigate criminals by deciding not to prosecute and this is a cause of great public complaints and dissatisfaction. On the other hand, the fact that criminal prosecution cannot be opened because of the prosecution's failure to issue indictments in some crimes that affect individuals constitutes another reason for injustice. In this regard, there is a need for a careful distinction between the crimes that should be followed by the prosecution offices and the crimes that can be sued in person, considering the elements of public interest and personal benefit.

- b) For matters like prepayment, postponement of public prosecution, effective repentance, agreement with perpetrators, prosecutors should be required to obtain permission from the court and to get approval from the court for their actions.
- c) Quality of the “return of indictment” institution should change, the “return of indictment” should be replaced by the “approval of the indictment” institution, the prosecutor’s accusations that may be the subject of criminal proceedings must be subject to the approval of a court specialized in these matters, which checks whether a case is ready to be tried in a single hearing with the evidence collection and interrogation stages. To that end, present-day criminal courts of peace should be transformed; new and improved versions of the interrogation and evidence courts that were abolished in the 1980s should be re-established; and the powers delegated to prosecutors at that time should be brought back to the mentioned court.

Instead of introduction of the arrangements proposed under Target 7.1(f) and (g), which will inevitably bring along new, additional and complex bureaucratic formalities, prosecutor's offices and the judicial police should be merged into an integrated service, and it should be ensured that prosecutors, except for those acting as counsels for the prosecution at hearings, act together with the judicial police and as their superiors in judicial proceedings. There is no reason justifying the separation of law enforcement officers' public order and crime prevention duties from their judicial duties in investigating and prosecuting the offender and, to be subjected to a different authority. For both types of duties be fulfilled in a lawful and effective manner, and the function of the police to be fulfilled in a lawful manner, it is obligatory that the duty and function of the prosecutor's office and the duty and function of the police should be integrated.

The action proposal in Target 7.1(g) stipulates employing law school graduates in law enforcement forces. Prosecutors must be present with the police force as their supervisors; other functions of the police force, such as border security, intelligence and fight against terrorism, must remain outside the control of prosecutors. If such arrangement is made, situations identified when fulfilling of these duties can be brought to the investigation fields of prosecutors as soon as possible.

As is seen, if such arrangement is made, there will be no problem with the coordination of the police and the prosecutors proposed in Target 7.1(f); there will be no need for a regulation, either.

Target 7.3 says, "Jurisdictions of courts will be reorganized and a new procedure will be introduced to shorten the processes for some simple acts."

In Target 7.3(a) and (b), reorganization of jurisdictions of criminal courts and the trial of certain offenses through a simplified and prompt procedure must be postponed until the single hearing principle is adapted after handling issues such as collection of evidence and obtaining expert opinion in criminal proceedings; then the situation must be evaluated. Because most of the existing problems arise from the failure of the single hearing principle, and a quick trial procedure bears the risk of violating the right to a fair trial.

Objective 8: Simplifying and Increasing the Efficiency of Civil Justice and Administrative Procedure

First of all, it must be noted that the process and procedure design foreseen by the Civil Procedure Code for legal proceedings contains significant errors and is not found appropriate for dispute resolution.

CPC, which does not ensure a sincere explanation of the material fact and even the evidence at hand, leaves the call and collection of the evidence not available to the process after the preliminary examination hearing. Parties without evidence and complete information are forced to go on an adventure and take unpredictable risks instead of litigating by determining their rights accurately.

Moreover, although it is possible to collect evidence while waiting in line for the trial's preliminary examination, time is wasted and resolving the case effectively and quickly is clearly prevented.

The preliminary examination institution, which is unclear right from the beginning and is like a bad copy of the certificate of duty that determines the agreement of parties and arbitrators in arbitration, must be abolished as soon as possible. The preliminary examination trial's name and design should be changed to "preliminary issues hearing"; only if there are situations that require immediate termination of the proceedings, such as duties, powers and statute of limitations, preliminary issue hearings should be held and a final decision must be made in a short time.

The archaic approach regarding the order of collecting evidence, which is prescribed under the former Code of Civil Law Procedure (CLPC) and is also maintained under the new Code of Civil Procedure (CPC), should be abandoned and modern processes should be introduced.

The parties should have access to all relevant evidence before issuing the lawsuit petition at the earliest stage of the case, preferably shortly after they have demonstrated their will to open the case (this may also be in the form of a notice or a short petition to the court), and prepare the case accordingly.

It can also be envisaged that this will be done at the next stage after petition has been submitted. In this case, the stage of evidence submission and collection must be brought between the case and reply petition stage and the rejoinder and the second reply stages; and once all the evidence has been collected, the stage of submitting the rejoinder and second reply petitions must start.

The methods of the internationally accepted IBA and similar organizations regarding evidence collection are easily applicable to the Turkish law.

“Prohibition on amendment of claim and defense”, which is a dominant approach also in CPC and which has become an established principle in the present day due to a simple theoretical mistake made in the 1950s, should undergo a major review and abolished. A new arrangement should be introduced stipulating that only the nature of the case may not be changed, and extending of the scope of the facts brought to/claimed before the court, as well as increasing or reducing the material value of the subject matter of the case should be allowed.

Proof constraints on the evidence to be brought for the proof of material facts must also be abolished; this must not be seen as an extension of the claim or defense. In this way, parties’ access to all evidence related to their case must be secured and it must be ensured that the material truth is revealed fully, completely and honestly. Also, it must be ensured that courts can rely on the declarations submitted to them and be able to intervene quickly. More importantly, this way, it must be ensured that the full material fact is submitted to courts and that the decisions are in accordance with the material fact and the actual situation. One of the reasons that people do not trust justice anymore is that the material fact cannot be revealed and as a result, decisions do not comply with the relevant material fact.

The methods described above are not first mentioned here. These are successfully applied in arbitration proceedings subject to the rules of İSTAÇ - Istanbul Arbitration Center - and other reputable arbitration centers. If Turkey develops an advanced legal procedure that reveals the material fact, this will significantly contribute both to gaining international credibility and help legal professionals to become capable to compete at the international level.

Simplifying the legal procedure this way will facilitate the work to be done and allow the parties to be more independent, while ensuring that the material fact is revealed with better quality at an earlier stage and disputes are settled with conciliation at an early stage. Also, this will allow proceedings can to resolved in a short time without delays caused by procedural processes, and at the same time, without violating the principle of “natural judge”.

On the other hand, depending on the fact that the judge is faced with a case that may end during their term of office, his/her level of interest will be raised to a very high level compared to a case that will be dealt with after a long time by the successor judge, which will inevitably remain at very low.

In such order, it will be very easy and improving to manage the performance of judges and the judiciary will be able to achieve great success in a short time.

The subject of "fees" referred to in Target 8.1(e) has led to an increase in the workload of the jurisdiction, as well as to procedural confusion and the creation of unnecessary new types of cases.

Issues introduced in Article 107 of CPC as "non-quantified debt claims" trick even those parties who are 100% right in their cases, and issues "partial claims and declaratory judgements", and "whether or not a declaratory judgement alone" divide jurisdictions into two groups, causing loss of time for the legal professionals. Almost all of the unnecessary controversies around these issues have emerged as a result of the arrangements introduced regarding legal fees.

Judicial fees, which already cause great injustice and irrationality, should no longer be the means of generating more revenue for the treasury; fees must be simplified and re-arranged to ensure the best performance of justice.

In the apothegm "Justice is the basis of the state", the term "justice" says that the state can become and remain strong by ensuring that the people become richer, thus being able to pay more taxes fairly; not through collecting fees.

How much of their rights the citizen litigates is never the concern of the state. The state is only obliged to provide necessary assistance to the citizen who cannot get their right. Therefore, anyone who shows that they have an interest and that they do not abuse their right to access to justice should be free to sue for any of their rights. Requesting the determination of the existence of a right must be sufficient to file a case; because the parties may dispute the existence of the right, but when this matter is clarified, they might not have any disagreement about the fulfillment of it.

Trial has two main functions: (i) resolving the dispute about the existence and amount of the right and (ii) deciding on the use of state power to obtain the right, existence of which was determined. On behalf of the State, the judiciary must not require the citizen to apply to make a request for both of these functions to be fulfilled.

This is what is aimed with the regulations on judiciary fees. Fees force the citizens to apply to judiciary for both of these functions, and even interfere with their right to "demand the fulfillment of their right partially at any time", for which they have the right to dispose. Therefore, regulations on judiciary fees must be removed from the situation obliging this.

On the other hand, it is not right or just to get a high share from the citizen's right, depending on the amount of the right. Judiciary fees of the state must be either symbolic and fixed, or related to the content, quality and duration of the service provided.

For example, amongst cases subject to the same kind of proceeding in the same court – e.g. commercial cases –, in a case of high value a fee of 100,000 TRY is received, whereas in another whose value is 100,000 TRY, receiving a fee of 5-6 thousand TRY is evidently not just. In addition to this, taking some part of the subject of case is not a civilized method.

With regard to some kind of cases, judiciary fees are cruel. For example, there is no rationale for receiving fees and allowances from family law cases and proceedings; on the contrary, it is like the parasitic feeding of the state from unhappy citizens. There should be no difference in the -procedural rules or the proceeding possibilities of judicial and administrative proceedings unless obligatory, and the proceedings should be subject to the same principles.

“Simplification of civil proceedings” in Target 8.1 can be achieved by providing - the full and correct disclosure and presentation of facts and evidence in the disputes - the code of honesty referred to in Target 8.2(a), extending the powers of lawyers to collect evidence within this framework, authorising the lawyers to obtain expert opinions and hear witnesses where necessary, and opening hearings in matured cases. Thus, the principle of a single hearing can be applied. Once the principle of single hearing is applied, it will become clear that there is no need for separation of duties between courts or for a simplified rapid trial; there is probably no need for a change.

Activity of “A simple procedure shall be applied in all cases where the subject matter can be measured in money and below a certain monetary amount” in Target 8.1(d) can have dangerous consequences.

This is because in cases where a monetary value is not determined (for example, the nullity of a patent), there are cases where the material value is much higher but the necessary care is not taken. This should be taken into account.

The scope of the activity of “The area of duty of the Consumer Courts will be redefined in proportion to the workload.” stated in Target 8.1(f) is not sufficient. Aspects under this heading must be expanded in the action plan and the opportunities must be expanded to meet all needs of society.

On the one hand, there is a rapid flow of lawsuits to the consumer courts and a large accumulation of business and consequent delays and quality problems have arisen, on the other hand, except for those reflected in the courts, consumer injustices of tens of hundreds times have surrounded the society.

The judiciary does not function in any way in the case of injustice that does not even cover the notification expense (such as amounts unjustly accrued to subscribers); such injustices are sought to be prevented by administrative measures.

On the one hand, this results in the transfer of the judicial function to the executive authorities, on the other hand, it prevents the formation of a system that complies with the law and protects the consumers effectively, and the creation of added value for the brands of the producers as well as the brand value of our country through the judiciary and the law.

To increase the export value of our country's products per kilogram from the current value of approximately 1 dollar to 10 or 20 dollars, which is their real potential, this area where the judiciary remains dysfunctional and ineffective needs to be regulated really well.

The approach "In order to better protect the collective interests envisaged for cases to which the state institutions are parties, the regulation on the community case will be reconsidered." in Target 8.1(g), with which the state has looked after itself and neglected the citizen, should now be abandoned. Because the state is not a holy person; it is an institution created by citizens to provide solidarity among themselves. Group case application must be included in the CPC as well; in cases that cannot be filed individually (for example, subscriptions and product liability) due to being economically insignificant (for example, cases that do not amount to notification costs), a class procedure must be introduced to simultaneously resolve thousands of cases arising from the same material reasons; the public belief that justice never applies in this area must be eliminated.

In developed countries, various community/class litigation systems were devised with the aim of eliminating the damages suffered by different people because of the same financial and legal reasons, thus creating high added value to get reliability.

It is already a long-standing need for Turkey to establish community trials and summary judgment-like institutions, as well as creating methods of online arbitration, as the case is in the EU, for certain disputes.

This way, thousands of cases that are based on documents and where the “right to access to justice” is commonly abused by debtors will be solved quickly, and it will be easily avoided to cause loss of time for the courts with unnecessary and abusive cases.

Simplification is required in the procedural rules of the judiciary; unnecessary and complicated procedural rules must be removed and, as our former masters once used to say, “the merits of the right must be superior to the procedure”. But care must be taken to ensure that no change is made that might compromise the fundamental judicial principles that ensure the quality of judgment and accuracy of decisions.

This could be possible by “Preventing abuse of the right to access to justice” stated in Target 8.2 and the “obligation to act honestly and tell the truth” stated in Target 8.2(a). It is a positive development that sanctions are imposed on the contrary behavior and that deterrent arrangement is made.

However, it is much more important to introduce mechanisms to ensure that this obligation is fulfilled and complied with, making it difficult or even impossible to conduct contrary behavior. Ensuring that the violation of the mechanisms and processes are subject to deterrent sanctions is more appropriate to achieve this goal. The idea of imposing a sanction does not justify compromising the uncovering of material fact and the proper conduct of the trial. Arrangements to be made must ensure that this principle is obligatory to comply with and that contrary behaviors are impossible. For example, arrangements must be made to comply with the obligations arising from international agreements such as asking questions to the parties; receiving answers; if the parties do not disclose the evidence under their control, identifying what such evidence is and forcing them to disclose it (for example TRIPS).

The thought behind the action proposal “Regarding the defendant who does not respond to the case or does not show the will to participate in the proceedings, the current application, where invitations are sent again to ensure that they are present at the court during verbal proceedings and on the day and at time appointed for the judgment, will be terminated.” in Target 8.2(b) is quite deep. It is appropriate to accept this idea in the Turkish procedural law.

To achieve this, the claimants’ obligation to tell the truth to the court must be fulfilled first; then it must be ensured that they disclose the full and correct evidence under their control; and after this, it must be ensured that a summary judgment can be established against those who do not show up to the court, reply to the invitation or defend their cause; if they object, it must be ensured that the trial is held by invalidating the provision.

This method will allow many cases that are opened unnecessarily and can be handled through simple proceedings to be concluded in a very short time. For example, there must be no need to file a lawsuit due to the failure to pay the electricity bill; collection through this method must be subject to a judicial decision and the extension of execution proceedings must be prevented.

Turkey is far behind in terms of activities of “In the judicial settlement process of disputes arising from family law, practices that deepen such disputes will be abolished.” in Target 8.3. The action plan should prioritize this issue, steps must be taken as soon as possible to strengthen the family institution.

Fees and expenses must not be collected from lawsuits or transactions related to family law; a significant portion of the attorneys' fees must be borne by the state.

Decisions of contribution and welfare allowance must not be given according to the perception of life of the judges and the research they will have the law enforcement officers make; they must be concluded swiftly and with the highest level of compliance possible according to the financial statements that include sworn statements for accuracy, that must obligatorily be submitted to the court after being filled out quickly, and that must be obligatorily confirmed with the relevant documents apart from exceptions.

As is the case with welfare allowances, the fact that the decisions that should be reassessed periodically with respect to financial states of the parties and revised as per changes and be annulled after a certain period of time are made for an indefinite period result in the judiciary causing great injustice. For example, innocent people who lose the ability to pay alimony are imprisoned. In this type of cases, parties should not try to convince the judge that their situation has changed; the judge who have made decision should have to regularly review whether there is any change in the situation and make the necessary change in the decision, even if there is no demand.

The activity of “Delivery of child and establishing a personal relationship with the child will be removed from the scope of duties of the executive directorates and this process will be provided by experts without any fees.” in Target 8.3(b) must be considered for the worst possibility.

It must be ensured that this process is carried out without the need for the will of the parties or judicial authorities to intervene. To do this, mechanisms must be created and deterrent sanctions must be imposed for those who prevent the relevant mechanism from functioning.

If the person liable for alimony can be imprisoned in case of failure to pay, practical measures may well resolve this problem, such as the immediate imposition of measures like disciplinary imprisonment of those who violate the rules for the delivery of children.

Objective 9: Spreading Alternative Dispute Resolution Methods

An advanced legal system must have different dispute resolution methods that practitioners know really well and can easily implement, and it must be possible to choose the most suitable one among these methods. Those which are the alternatives to the state court from a wide range of tailored methods must be encouraged to a certain extent and in balance, and as a result, it must be ensured that conflicts in society are resolved effectively but without compromising on quality. Alternative methods, although named so, must not become an alternative to the judicial power and function of the state. Alternative methods should therefore be encouraged in various ways (such as tuition and expense reductions), but never made compulsory.

Alternative dispute resolution methods should be developed not only for private law but also for administrative disputes and even criminal proceedings. However, characteristics of each different jurisdiction should be taken into consideration; dangers such as the use of state power in contradiction to the basic principles and ultimately formation of executive or judicial intent by the administrative bodies, authorities and prosecutors using the state power, should be foreseen from the very beginning and preventive measures should be taken accordingly at the starting phase of these applications; and arrangements should be made in this regard.

It was observed that the regulation in the Civil Procedure Law that states that the judge should encourage the parties to settle for peace, is not effective enough in terms of fulfilling the purpose of the establishment of the institution in practice. For this reason, it is said that “arrangements are planned to spread the application.”, but, on the contrary, this obligation, which has become an unnecessary and disturbing formality, must be annulled. Alternative pre-litigation resolution methods for disputes are already being used with enough pressure. It is an unnecessary formality for the judge to invite the parties to settlement. There is no sanction to be applied if the parties do not comply, anyway.

In conclusion:

It is gratifying that the will of judiciary reform is adopted at the highest level within the executive power and a kind of commitment has been made, but it is contradictory that this commitment is appropriated by the executive power that the judiciary must control and balance.

Although the Judicial Reform Strategy 2019 document reached a wider and a more diverse circle of stakeholders compared to the previous documents while it is being drawn up, not all stakeholders were covered properly. The methodology of the document is not clear or obvious; the objectives, current situation, tactics and sub-objectives required by a strategy document are not clear. As the action plan is left for later, elements such as actions, responsible parties, maturity, monitoring and measurement are missing.

Although conventional complaint topics have been identified, the problems and root causes of such complaints have not been analyzed. Although action proposals were made to resolve complaints, the lack of a root cause analysis prevents it from being put forward consistently as a whole. Wrong or non-false suggestions on their own are not in the overall plan.

Therefore, we think that the Judicial Reform 2019 document may make limited progress on some issues but it will not be enough for the change Turkey and the society needs, and that it will be necessary to prepare a new strategy document after a while; also, we find it regrettable and disappointing that despite the fact that a significant amount of public resources have been spent to issue 3 strategy documents since 2009, a scientific, healthy and complete judicial reform strategy has not yet been developed.

By having a fully independent, effective, transparent and accountable judiciary, Turkey can have a liberal and participatory democracy by way of spreading the rule of law across all parts of society, particularly the public, and preserving and developing freedom of thought and expression, and it can increase its prosperity to the level of developed countries.

Having an advanced legal order and democracy, Turkey acts as the key to a better understanding between the East and West and the formation of effective interaction and cooperation between them. If this happens, Turkey can open the door to great opportunities not only for itself but also for its sensitive geography, its neighbors and the world by making important contributions to ensuring peace and stability in international level and preventing conflicts in the world.

Therefore, it is not correct to bind and condition Turkey's efforts -to democratize and reform its institutions accordingly- to the EU membership. At the same time, it should be noted that the perspective of EU membership is a very important anchor for Turkey in the field of democracy, law and the judiciary and that every step to be taken in this direction will bring Turkey closer to its supreme ideal. Turkey should not forget that it needs to reform for its own future and purposes.

However, the Judicial Reform Strategy 2019 document is not an adequate plan to resolve the criticisms made in the European Council 2019 Progress Report. In the 2015 Progress Report of the EU for Turkey, the Strategy Document for 2015 was defined as “a very general plan document” and the following statement was used:

“A revised judicial reform strategy was adopted in April 2015. The strategy targets the main shortcomings of the judicial system. However, it is a very general planning document, specifying lead institutions and broad timelines, but providing only limited detail on envisaged steps and actions and no assessment of budgetary implications. It is crucial that the strategy be implemented with the involvement of all relevant stakeholders, including the civil society.”

We are not sure that limited progress in the JRS 2019 document, which includes similar activities on the same topics, deserves a better assessment. We wish that the action plan to be announced in the future will change the way we think and we want to contribute voluntarily to the preparation of the action plan for this purpose.

Indeed, the document, which has not yet prepared an action plan and does not contain a status assessment, vision or a long term plan regarding the subject matters it covers, is considered a policy document by our Association rather than a strategy document in technical matters.

In accordance with the purposes of its establishment, our Association is ready to work to ensure that the JRS becomes a perfect strategy and that the strategy documents to be prepared are scientific, comprehensive and sufficient to obtain results.

For this reason, through this Report, we are inviting the public to make seminal, positive and constructive suggestions to create a strategy document which will be adopted by all stakeholders and where all relevant parties will be covered, and problems and root causes will be determined accurately.

We are proud to announce to the public that our Association is ready to undertake this duty, as it believes that a new strategy document should be created with a supra-political understanding and an equal distance to all political views.

Respectfully submitted for the attention of the Turkish public on the occasion of the opening of the New Legal Year.
